TOWN PLANNING

A Plea Presented For Foresight in Civic Growth.

This Subject to be Discussed at a Conference in London.

(By H. C. Carson, F. S. S., in Toronto Financial Post.)

A body of men, international and representative in character, will shortly be assembled in London, England, for the purpose of discussing, in a practical way, the subject which heads this article. That such a convention will be timely and oportune, is conceded—if the writer be not mistaken, the British Government is behind the movement, and one of the Cabinet Ministers is actively participating in the preliminary work of organization. This is a significant omen. It shows that the meeting is being called, not to discuss civics from an academic standpoint, but in a spirit of real endeavor to solve existing problems of municipal government.

Those who have visited the cities of Europe and the older cities of this continent, must have been impressed with the almost total lack of original design shown in their construction. Many of them seem to have been permitted to grow without guidance or restraint, and in evident defiance of the principles of system and good order. The result is narrow and crooked streets congested with traffic—irregular building lines and more irregular architecture, together with—in the States and Canada particularly—unsightly poles and wires, contributing their due share to marring what might, in some cases, at least, have given a pleasing and harmonious effect.

Many of these cities, even at this late day, have come to realize the errors of the past, and are busily engaged, at enormous expense, in the work of reconstruction. Landmarks, hoary with age, and rich in historic association, are being sacrificed to make way for modern needs. Even London and Rome have become imbued with this progressive spirit, and in both of these cities vast works have been undertaken, thecompletion of which will transform them in appearance and redound to their great advantage in health, comfort and convenience.

The lesson of the old world until recently had no meaning for us, and so we, too, had narrow and crooked streets, irregular building lines and unsightely, and often dangerous poles and wires. The work of reconstruction should, in certain of the older cities, be begun, even if at a heavy cost.

A heavy responsibility rests upon the shoulders of our civic authorities throughout the country. The slipshod and short-viewed methods of the past must be changed.

Men with real knowledge, and real authority, must take the reins. Mistakes must be corrected, and their results eradicated. Conservatism is useful as a brake, but it will never, of itself, drag anything uphill.

The civic machinery must be readjusted, not only to fit present needs, but with an eye to the future and its potentialities.

Particularly is there a lesson here for the people of the new west. Let them become students of civic history, and in planning and governing the new towns and cities which are springing up, profit by the mistakes and oversights of the older communities.

The most enlightened principles should obtain. Plans should be made wisely from the start, and growth directed along the lines of a pre-conceived and pre-directed programme of streets, sewers and water mains, and other considerations which make up the modern requirements of city life.

Vera (8 years old)—What does transatlantic mean, mother?

Mother—"Across the Atlantic," of course; but you mustn't bother me.

Vera—does "trans" always mean across?

Mother—I suppose it does. Now, if you don't stop bothering me with your questions I shall send you right to bed.

Vera (after a few minutes' silence)—Then does transparent mean cross parent?

SALT RISING BREAD.

Here's a Girl Who Knows How to Make It Most Deliciously."

(By Lenora Stubbs, daughter of Kansas Governor.)

At night take one-half of a cupful of cornmeal and a small pinch of sugar and salt each, scald with new milk heated to the boiling point, and mix to the thickness of a mush. I usually make this up in the cup. Wrap in a clean cloth and put in a warm place over night.

In the morning take a one-gallon stone jar and in this put one scant cup of new milk. Add a level teaspoonful of salt and one of sugar. Scald this with three cups of water, heated to the boiling point. I would advise a milk thermometer to insure success. Reduce the temperature to 108 degrees with cold water. Then add flour and mix to a good batter and lastly mix your "starter" that was made the night before. Cover with a plate. Put this stone jar in a large kettle of water and keep this water at a temperature of 108 degrees until the sponge rises. It should rise at least an inch and one-half. When it has raised mix to a stiff dough and make into loaves and put in pans. Do not let the heat out of the dough while working. Grease your loaves well on top and set your bread where it will be warm and rise. After the loaves rise bake in a medium oven for one hour and ten minutes. After taking loaves from oven wrap up well in bread cloth.

CALLOUSNESS IN HOSPITAL.

(The Forum.)

Disregard for the needless suffering of charity patients, especially children, cannot possibly be condoned or excused. In spite of the great and noble work done by the hospitals and free clinics, there is occasion for shame and indignation when we have to stand by and see helpless children with broken limbs being twisted and turned and pulled and jerked around with no one to raise a voice of protest and no law to invoke to mitigate their needless suffering.

I know of many city hospitals where this cruel practice still obtains, of bone-setting without the aid of a little gas or chloroform to ease the sufferer, and the excuse in every case is the need of economy. Yet the material would cost but a few cents —probably less than the cigar that the operator lights when the clinic is over—and this paltry sum, and the callousness of the hospital authorities, are all that stand between the agonized patient and a painless operation.

From the Persian.

Alas for those who have tasted once
Of that forbidden vintage of the lips
That, press'd and pressing, from each other draw
The draught that so intoxicates them both;
That, while upon the wings of Day and Night
Time rustles on, and Moons do wax and wane,
As from the very Well of Life they drink,
And, drinking, fancy they shall never drain,
But rolling Heaven from his ambush whispers
"So in my license is it not set down:
An for the sweet societies I make
At Morning, and before the Nightfall break;
An for the bliss that coming Night fills up,
And Morn looks in to find an empty cup!"

THE CARE OF A CITY'S TREES.

In several American cities the general health of the trees is watched no less closely than that of the general population. The priceless value of shade trees, is relieving the long vexed lines of our city streets, and bringing a breath of the country to our very doors and windows, has never been so fully realized as during the last few years. In several colleges thestudy of city forestry is made a special course and especially trained to perform the work.

The care with which the work is organized and directed will come as a surprise to the average citizen. In Brooklyn, where the city forestry work is very well organized, a complete census is kept of every tree throughout the city. There are some 35,000 of these trees and naturally a regular system is followed in keeping the records. A card index system is employed, in which a separate card is filled out and kept on record for every tree. The locality of the tree, its approximate age and general health are carefully observed and set down. A corps of trained inspectors go about the city visiting and inspecting every tree at least once a year, and, if the health of the tree be precarious, at more frequent intervals.

City trees are subject to a greater variety of ills than their country cousins, and the list of ailments for which they must be treated is a long one. If a tree, for example, be attacked by any dangerous insect, bug, or growth of any kind, the fact is recorded on its card at headquarters, and a skilful tree doctor prescribes for it. The prescription is filled at the city's expense, and the medicine is duly administered.

One day Tommy came in with his face dirty and a black eye. "Why, Tommy," said his mother, "I though I told you to count a hundred before you fought."

"Well, mamma, I did," said the tearful boy, as related in Paris Modes, "but look what the other boy did while I was counting."

Mother—Just run upstairs, Tommy, and fetch baby's nightgown.

Tommy—Don't want to.

Mother—Oh, well, if you're going to be unkind to your little new sister, she'll put on her wings and fly back to heaven.

Tommy—Then let her put on her wings and fetch her nightgown.

Tommy—Then what yer kickin' about? I've got it, ain't I?

Teacher—Now, Tommy, what is the meaning of the word 'purchase?

Tommy—Don't know, ma'am.

Teacher—Well, if your papa gave your mother $10 to go and buy a new hat, what would your mother do?

Tommy—Have a fit, I guess.

A MOTHER'S ADVICE TO OTHER MOTHERS

Mrs. Nicholas Breau, Rogersville, N. B., writes: "I can highly recommend Baby's Own Tablets to all mothers whose little ones are constipated. I gave my little girl the Tablets and they regulated her bowels and now she sleeps well, eats well, is fat and good all the time. I am really delighted with the Tablets and I always keep them in the house and as soon as my little girl becomes troubled or feverish I give her the Tablets and she is soon well again. Please send me another box, for they are the very best medicine I know of for little ones." The Tablets are sold under a guarantee to contain nothing injurious to even the youngest child. Sold at 25 cents a box by all medicine dealers or from The Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

I AM YOUR WIFE.

Oh, let me lay my head to-night upon
your breast,
And close my eyes against the light, I
fain would reast,
I'm weary and the world looks sad; this worldly strife
Turns me to you; and, oh, I'm glad to be your wife!
Though friends may fail and turn aside,
yet I have you,
And in your love I may abide, for you
are true—
My only solace in each grief and despair,
Your tenderness is my relief; it soothes
each care.
If joys of life could alienate this poor,
weak heart
From yours, then may no pleasure
great enought to part
Our sympathies fall to my lot. I'd e'er remain
Bereft of friends, though true or not,
just to retain
Your true regard, your presence bright,
thro' care and strife,
And, oh! I thank my God to-night, I am your wife!

One of the smallest railways in the world, aside from the miniature systems in the summer parks, is a private line in England, which runs from Balderton to Eaton hall. The hall, as well as the railway, belongs to the Duke of Westminster.

There are two engines on the Eaton Hall Railway, the largest weighing about four tons with a tank capacity of seventy gallons.

The single passenger car is twenty feet long and has a seating capacity of sixteen passengers. There are a number of freight cars used in hauling coal and other supplies. The little trains make regular runs, connecting with the trains on the Great Western Railway.

Had Her Way at Last.

There was once a girl in Atchison who had never had her way. Her father bulldozed and tryannized over her and when he was Called Home her mother began it, and up to the time the girl was forty-five she had never selected even a hair ribbon. Then the good angels came to her mother, and when the girl managed her mother's funeral she went about the task of ordering hacks and flowers and selecting text and hymns with a smile. "How bravely she is taking it," friends said who came in to see her weep, but found no one to weep with, "but she is holding herself in." She was really letting herself out and enjoying it. "My mother always said she thought pink flowers were inappropriate for funerals," she said, putting pink flowers in the coffin. Then the girl managed her mother's funeral having been told all her life that if such an occasion arose she should wear black.—Atchison Globe.

THE SILENCE EXPLAINED

A North Philadelphia little girl had been so very naughty that her mother found it necessary to shut her up in a dark closet—in that family the direst punishment for the worst offence. For fifteen long minutes the door had been locked without a sound coming from behind it. Not a whimper nor a spiffle.

At last the stern, but anxious parent, unlocked the closet door and peered into the darkness. She could see nothing.

"What are you doing in there?" she cried.

WHAT WOMEN ARE SAYING.

"The American woman is not a door mat. She is vain enough to prefer to stand upright. She is the most chummable woman in the world, with a marvellous variety of interest in common with her husband. And American women are better housekeepers than ever before—when they need to be."—Mrs. Wilson Woodrow, novelist.

"We women do not wear the native costume any more in Japan. We dress by the American plan, keep house that way, and enjoy an automobile ride just as you do. But we don't put on false hair. Somehow, we like the better natural, and without a hat on it. We believe in marriage and fair-sized families. The average is four children."—Baroness Matsui, wife of Japan's wealthiest citizen, now visiting in America.

JOHN BULL AND TRUSTS

Americans Who Found the Tight Little Island Too Much for Them.

What is a trade-war?

It is a battle in which no blood is spilt, but which can bear results every bit as serious as those which occur on the actual field of war. Two great organizations are pitted against each other. Silently, with scarcely a sound above the scratching of a pen, the more powerful faction presses its opponent back, and upon the issues depends the welfare of thousands, many of whom have no idea that any kind of battle is being fought at all.

In the present trade-war between Lord Cowdray and the Standard Oil Co., John Bull is standing in the ring with Uncle Sam, and is knocking him out. They are fighting over the great oil-fields of Mexico, and, although the Standard Oil Co. have used every means in their power to outwit their English rival, and even employed spies to shadow him in New York, they have found their match. The British oil magnate is beating them at their own game.

The Standard Oil Co. have not had many such reverses. Forty-five years ago, Mr. John D. Rockefeller realized the great possibilities that lay in oil, formed a syndicate, and proceeded to buy up every rival syndicate. He often paid absurdly high prices to his rivals in order to gain absolute control. If they refused to sell, he either retailed oil in their districts at a loss, or else actually gave it away, until they were forced, through lack of business, to admit themselves beaten.

A particularly interesting trade-war was that fought recently between the English and American tobacconists. The American Tobacco Co. was one of the most formidable syndicates that ever threatened our chalky cliffs.

It was an amalgamation of five separate companies, which, previously, had tried to cut each other's throats in their own country. They had placed wonderful "Surprise Packets" and other advertising dodges upon the market. They had blazoned the walls with enormous posters. One company had spent $1,500,000 annually in advertising its principal feature, "Battle Axe Plug," the price of which underwent tremendous reductions. For the small price of fivepence, the American elastic-jawed chewer could buy a plug of "Battle Axe" three inches broad by over half an inch thick, and a foot long.

But when these old rivals banded together, and invaded England under the banner of the American Tobacco Co., they found themselves absolutely outclassed. By offering a bonus of $1,000,000 a year for four years to all the English retailers who would supply their cigarettes, and nobody else's, at a certain low figure, they hoped to get the entire monopoly of the tobacco custom of England. Before the temptation had spread too far, however, the English tobacconists joined forces, and formed themselves into the Imperial Tobacco Co. The Americans, instead of dealing with a host of small, independent merchants, found themselves face to face with a solid organization representing almost the entire tobacco interest of the British Isles. So they packed up their cheap cigarettes, and took the next boat home.

But the matter did not end there. The tobacconists who had been promised their big bonuses, and who had received only one half year's payment, sued the American company for the balance. At the first the Americans refused to pay, arguing that, as their company had been liquidated, their liabilities had also ceased to exist. A test case was decided against them, however, and they wished more than ever that they had left the English bull-dog alone.—London Answers.

What's the Limit to City's Size?

Now that we know just how many people live in New York and Chicago and other cities, the question is brought before us: "How large can a city get under modern conditions?" Admittedly there is a limit. A century ago, before the days of steam and electric transportation, telegraphs and telephones, steam heated flats, etc., a city of 5,000,000 inhabitants would have been a human impossibility. But London to-day has more than seven and one-half millions. Population experts and prophets have figured that New York or Chicago (depending upon his sympathies) will have ten or twelve millions in forty or fifty years. That result is possible, but is it probable? The larger a city becomes the less self-supporting it is. Practically every item of food, clothing, and home making material must be transported for various distances, the length increasing with the increase in the size of the city. Transportation of raw materials is expensive, and the handling of vast quantities in the congested centres becomes more difficult as the volume of traffic and number of people increase. It is possible to improve our transportation facilities, but there is a limit to that improvement.—Chicago Tribune.

AN ELECTRIC ERASER

A draftsman seldom has the patience to erase an ink line from tracing cloth properly. If the eraser is operated with too much pressure the cloth is marred. The proper method is to operate the eraser with a light but quick motion. Recently, an electrically-driven eraser has been invented, consisting of a small motor provided with a flexible shaft which carries a circular eraser at its outer end. In order to clean the eraser of particles of ink which it picks up, a cleaning rubber is provided, which bears lightly against the erasing rubber. A device of this sort should be sufficient to meet the requirements of a large drafting room.
