An exchange hits the nail on the head when it says: If we were to put in a two-line local in the most obscure corner of the paper, which stated that a certain business man charged more for his goods or kept an inferior quality than his competitors, than men would employ a slugger to come around and kill us in the morning. But if we were to ask the same man for an advertisement of his wares, he would say: "No; I don't believe in advertising; no one reads the papers."

Any one pissing up or down our sts. can easily see that the largest advertisers do the greatest business. In the present age where competition is so keen, merchants must advertise their goods, and invite purchasers, or they might just as well put up their shutters at once. A man withdraws his advertisement from the local paper, and he soon finds his trade leaves him—he feels as though something had gone wrong, yet he fails, as a rule, to trace the trouble to the right source. Advertisements are read, and few people go where they are not invited. Our readers should scan our columns carefully, then go and deal with those who are not ashamed to make their business known, and courteously invite custom.
