Fund Reaches $380,000

As the recreation centre building fund neared the halfway mark today, B. W. Anderson, general chairman, said indications were that good financial support for the project may be expected from national corporations.

"It is imperative, if we are to get generous help from corporations based in Toronto and Montreal, that the local area contribute as much as humanly possible first", Mr. Anderson said. "This is the only was these large corporations can be convinced that the public living in the area where the complex is being built are really behind it and want it."

To date, the campaign has reached a figure of $380,000. Since returns were coming in at a rate of about $50,000 a week so far, it seemed likely to Mr. Anderson that the halfway figure of $420,000 should be surpassed next week.

Nigel Richardson, director of the Haldimand-Norfolk study committee, outlines the land use plan report presented at a special meeting at the Jarvis Community Centre Tuesday.

Town Concept

about 1975) and a "period of maturity (when all services and recreational facilities are available for a large population) about 1991.

Mr. Richardson said that Simcoe, Cayuga, and Port Dover are the only existing urban centres that have facilities enough to take care of an influx of some 13,000 people by 1975.

He said the reference of a single new urban concentration shouldn't mean to imply that there never will be more than one large urban centre in the study area.

"It is considered that the urban growth strategy for the study area should be based on the selection of a single locality in which development areas should be focused for a certain period of time."

He also stressed that the urban and industrial developments will only require 50,000 acres of land which is only seven per cent of the land in the study area.

He said this means that agriculture will play a major role in the economy of the area.

Mr. Richardson's report also predicted that new express roadways would be constructed in the area.

He suggested these would be from Windsor to here following Highway 3; from Brantford to the area and along Highway 6 from Hamilton.

He said the plan for the Haldimand-Norfolk area must be as flexible as possible because it is impossible to predict precisely the emerging patterns of such centres.

Minister of Municipal Affairs Darcy McKeough, said, the developments in the area have made a unique opportunity to entwine all departments and local authorities together in formulating a joint presentation of a plan.

"These documents will change in many ways over the following years.

"I announced the Haldimand-Norfolk study a year ago when suddenly a sleepy part of Ontario was purchased by Stelco for the site of a steel complex.

"We need planning to protect our environment. This is an opportunity to handle a rapid expansion in the right way.

He said the views of Mr. Richardson reflects the views of the joint study group and some problems that were presented to the government.

He emphasised that the study would not go on forever and the plans presented at the meeting were there to be pulled apart and local municipal authorities were free to express their opinions about them.

"From this we expect to be able to prepare a final plan", he said.

The concept of the "new town", brought out in the land use report, didn't necessarily mean that it would be a new urban centre.

Mr. Richardson said it could be one of three existing urban centres in the area that could receive government help in creating the facilities necessary for a city with a population of 100,000.

He said that this didn't mean that existing urban centres in the area would not get growth.

The concept of a new town, however, not connected with existing centres was the opposite of Mr. McKeough's announcement last year that the goweth would be channelled to the existing centres.
