

WON BY AN ENGLISHMAN

A LOVE STORY.

I chuckled with delight, and indeed my joy was so great that I was in mental fear of this last remark of Diane's might be too pointed, and would reveal the drift of our allusions; but fortunately for us, and somewhat oddly, considering the exceptional intelligence of our hearers, our observations and mirth excited no apparent surprise; and Diane's parents, while warming to the conversation, which became general at this time, seemed to consider me of no account whatsoever, while they relaxed their fixed attention on their daughter's movements.

I knew too well the hold which propriety has over French people of all classes and all ages to exhibit even to the girl I so passionately loved, and whose love I now felt authorized to win for myself, any other sign or token of my admiration than those which words allowed or the play of the countenance revealed; but with a girl like Diane, whose heart laid bare the warm feelings of her soul, and whose soul was so pure that it could not hide the truth of what she felt, words and looks were ample to convey all I wished; and I can never forget how singularly beautiful was the reception of those messages of love from one young heart to another, and with what rapture I marked in Diane's eyes her appreciation of the love she had resolved to accept and to return.

By the end of dinner we were one in heart, soul, mind, and purpose, without having said one syllable which any one could take up; without on my part having made any formal declaration, or obliged her to give a single expressed answer to any specified request.

But for all that, the electric spark which prepares the storm had been struck; and strong in one another's love, young and inexperienced though we were, we had made up our minds to fight for one another, and to bear cheerfully the evils that would ensue, certain of a heavenly peace on earth when the strong will of our earnest natures had successfully weathered the tempest about to rage upon our devoted heads.

As we rose from dinner, and all returned to the drawing-room in the order in which we had come into dinner, we gave each other but one look—a look so full of deep, passionate love that any one who could have seen it would have required no other sign of our determination to settle matters ourselves, and at the same time so infinitely tender that it is simply compensated for the absence of those more usual, but in France less customary, pressures of the hand and arm, which, if they are only natural and excusable, are less respectful to the loved object before the words have been pronounced which consecrate the engagement.

Soon after the coffee had been served the marquise's carriage was announced, and she took her leave with Diane. Happily, M. de Breteuille remained; so I had the satisfaction of seeing Diane to her carriage, while the count gave his arm to her mother. I then told her I should call on her father next day early, if indeed I had not the opportunity of seeing him that very evening; that I trusted she knew for what motives; and that, had I by any misfortune mistaken her sanction to this proceeding, I implored of her to say so.

She smiled one of those maddening smiles which simply sent all my senses reeling with intoxicated pleasure, and merely said in her ordinary voice, as if she wished her mother to hear,

"Do not forget my roses before you leave for England. Mademoiselle Garoux would be furious if you did not admire them. She is certain there is nothing in the world like them, and I hope you will subscribe to that sentiment."

"I shall certainly call with your mother's permission," I replied, "though I am already of Mademoiselle Garoux's opinion."

"Mother," said Diane to Mademoiselle de Breteuille, "as what time did you say M. de Maupert's family are coming to see you to-morrow?"

"At about three, I believe," replied the marquise, while her cloak was being put on.

Then at what time can Mr. Vere come and bid us good-bye?"

"Will 5 o'clock suit him?"

"It is too late for him, mamma," said Diane, "if he has to leave in the evening."

"Would Monsieur prefer 2 o'clock?"

"Could he not come to breakfast at half past eleven?"

"Diane," said Mademoiselle de Breteuille, "what a child you are! Mr. Vere knows you are a fiancee."

"So I am!" exclaimed Diane, laughing, and looking at me. "Comme c'est drôle!" she replied.

"How the part suits you!" I remarked.

"I suppose," she said, "that dinner must have some influence on these things; because, curiously enough, I do feel a fiancee now, and I did not before."

"Does a fiancee write?" I asked as her mother stepped into the carriage.

"By the governess's post sometimes," she replied, smiling; and then, shaking hands with me, entered the brougham laughing.

As soon as she had disappeared, Raymond de Chantalis who was really an intimate friend of mine—so much so that we called each other by our Christian names—said,

"You could have married that girl if you had been clever."

"I shall marry her, though I am not," I replied.

He looked at me a moment.

"That's well said," he remarked, "but difficult of accomplishment."

"Why?"

"Parbleu! because another man has forestalled you."

"Yes—with the father."

"And maybe with the girl."

"I don't think so."

"Certainly with her mother."

"That may be."

"Two parents against you is too much."

"I must bear that evil."

"Come and have a cigar before you commit suicide."

"How?"

"By marrying or by attempting to defeat a French marriage by English ways."

"I shall be happy to die in either cause."

"Surely your English blood is calmer than that phrase would imply?"

"Its calmness lies in its determination."

"And its determination is to ruin the happiness of a young and beautiful girl, in order to prove that her parents, who loved her and have sought her happiness only, may be shown to be in love with love with their only child."

"My dear Raymond, you quite mistake me. Had I not the knowledge that M. de Maupert was positively disinterested, Mademoiselle Diane, I would never have allowed my own feelings to be known or perceived."

"But," said the count, "surely you must be aware that there is nothing new in a girl disliking the husband chosen for her. Our French girls are no exception to the rule of humanity, that we all prefer what we select ourselves to what others consider best in our interest; but they get over it in time, and end by wondering how it is they ever opposed their parents' wish."

"I quite understand what you say, but characters differ; and Diane's nature is not that of an ordinary French girl, and will not submit to that despotic rule which may answer in a few cases, seldom proves fortunate in most, and results in terrible misery in one out of ten marriages thus contracted."

"My dear friend," replied the count, "believe me, my niece, of whose character you evidently know more than I do, but for whose beauty I can quite appreciate your admiration, for I never saw her look so well as this evening, comes from too French a family not to be doomed to the traditional fate of French girls. Make your mind easy; and though a short while since I was regretting the necessity of your departure, I rejoice over it now, as it will cure you of a passing and hopeless fancy. You are too young to cope against the position and influence of M. de Maupert, and though I have no doubt the future is bright which looms before you, dismiss my niece from any share in it. Indeed, as your friend, I would recommend your not thinking of marriage at all. Remember the old proverb, 'Mieux vaut le corde au cou.'"

"But, Raymond," I said, "I am decided, and if I could feel that you were the friend you always were, I would tell you that your niece is quite as decided as I am."

"Has she told you so?"

"Not in so many words."

"Then how do you know?"

"By a thousand and one tokens."

"Mon cher!" he exclaimed, "that is very vague, and, to tell you the truth, not quite complimentary to my niece, for it would seem to imply that she is either a coquette or is deceitful."

"Deceitful!" I screamed—"she is deceitful? Why, of all the French girls I have ever known she is the only one that I can absolutely call truthful, loyal and straightforward."

"Not very kind to our girls," remarked Raymond, in an amused rather than a severe tone.

"And as to the coquette," I went on, "if a desire to stand true to her love, and a wish to do so without offending the parents she respects, is coquetry, then she need not fear the appellation, for it does her honor."

"Allons!" said the count, good-humoredly, "I see she has a champion, and I wish him success, though I fear Don Quixote has a representative in your person; but go to Madame de Chantalis; she understands these matters better than I do, and will relish having a hand in this romantic business; our union was a very prosaic affair, and our lives have lost nothing by being unpoetical at the commencement."

"You were not forty-two, and she sixteen at the outset," I said.

"That is the only sensible remark you have yet made," replied the count, as he opened the door of his smoking-room.

Hearing us going in M. de Breteuille and Madame de Chantalis joined us. As they did so I went up to the former, and asked whether he would allow me to see him on a private matter the next morning. He replied that he would be much honored by my visit, and would be at my "orders" at any hour I pleased to name.

"I have promised to call and take leave of the marquise at 2 o'clock; perhaps you would allow me to see you immediately after."

I did this because, as I anticipated his possible answer, I feared I would not be allowed to see Diane again after receiving it, and this prospect was too painful to contemplate; but in a manner which had much softened since dinner he had made no objection, but on the contrary told me I would find him in his study among a heap of stuffed animals and papers, engaged in compiling a dictionary of zoology which he thought might be completed if he lived to a hundred, but had little chance of enlightening his generation if he were not accorded a longer life than most men.

"Il faut bien passer le temps," he remarked, "and that is how I spend my time when I am not at the club."

"You will miss Diane," said the countess, who, I thought, might have spared me the sad reflection the remark entailed.

"Not at all, because she will never leave home," replied the marquise. "No one who marries my daughter can do so on any other condition."

"This I thought was directed to me, but I listened without making any remark."

"Nor," continued the marquise, "do I think that Diane would care to leave her old father."

"Not so old," remarked Raymond.

"A father always seems old to his child," said the marquise. "Besides, Diane has many tastes; she is an extraordinary girl. Her fancies are not those of other girls, and her tenacity is perfectly surprising. If she helps me in any of my researches, and I feel inclined to give up a task I sometimes find too wearisome, so as to devote another time to it when I can bring a mind fresher and more lucid to its discovery, Diane will continue it in my absence and greet me at dinner with an 'I have found it, papa,' which puts me to shame and impresses me deeply."

How I drank in these words, and how I glowed in having found favor with such a character!

"De Maupert," continued the count, "did not like her to dine out this evening, and I told her so. She asked me whether there was anything wrong in it. I could not say there was. Her mind was made up, and all the entreaties of her mother were absolutely futile. As I could not back up her mother's arguments she had had her way, but" (turning to me) "you must believe, monsieur, that my fatherly weakness alone is the cause of this breach of the rules which guide the conduct of an engaged young person in France."

It was clear that this simple-minded and excellent man was no schemer; it was equally plain that he adored his daughter, and that she could rule him as she pleased. These were important points to note; but I was no less surprised by his talking so openly before me—as if he wished to convey information or my guidance—than by the apparent ignorance he either affected or entertained of my sentiments for his daughter.

I did not reflect that until I addressed him directly on the subject he would, as a matter of course, appear wholly ignorant, and would treat me as the most unbecomingly being he might casually come across; but for all that, he was slowly turning into that lightning conductor which Diane had so wistfully asked him at dinner whether he would care to be in order to protect us both from the impending storm.

Looking casually at his watch, the marquise found it later than he thought, got up, and respectfully kissing his sister's hand, wishing me "Au revoir a demain," and shaking hands with Raymond took his departure.

I got up also to say good-bye, when the countess made me sit down, and opened out as to the proceedings of Diane and myself that evening.

Addressing her husband, she said to him, "My dear, we have to stand by these two lovers; for in the whole course of my life I never saw such open love-making on both sides."

(To be continued)

Why the Silkier Didn't Cure.

A fakir in medicine had just opened out in St. Thomas, when a sturdy young farmer pushed his way into the crowd and said:

"See here, mister man, you were over at Clifton in June?"

"Yes, sir."

"You were selling this same stuff?"

"I was."

"Warranted to cure rheumatism, neuralgia, headache, ague, bad liver, indigestion and about forty other things?"

"Yes, sir. I guaranteed it."

"I had a torpid liver. Went to three different doctors and all of them said she was torpid. I paid you $1 for a bottle."

"Well?"

"Well, she didn't cure. Didn't have no more effect than water. I want my money back."

"Gentlemen!" exclaimed the fakir, as he looked around on the crowd, "you have heard what this man says. He calls my South American elixir a 'fraud' because it didn't cure his liver trouble."

"No; it didn't!" shouted the farmer.

"Then let us see way. Did you eat pork?"

"No, sir."

"Sleep on a feather bed?"

"No, sir."

"Drink tea or coffee?"

"No, sir."

"Take plenty of exercise?"

"Yes, sir."

"Have a bath once or twice a week?"

"Yes, sir."

"Go to bed early?"

"Yes, sir."

"Now then, my friend, answer me one more question. What was the state of your mind while taking my elixir?"

"I was fair."

"Were you engaged to a girl?"

"Y-es, sir."

"And didn't she give you the shake?"

"She—she married another man," stammered the farmer, as he tried to get out of the crowd.

"Ah! I knew it! Gentlemen, behold the conspirator—the assassin—the Shylock! He is in love. His liver is torpid. He buys a bottle of my elixir. It is warranted to straighten the kinks out of a torpid liver at the rate of forty kinks an hour; but does he give it a fair show? No, gentlemen! This fiend in human form pursues his fair victim. He offers her his heart, but she won't have it. He persists. She still refuses. He finally loses her. Emotion bangs his liver from port to starboard—adds to the number of kinks—wobbles all over Ontario, and then he calls me a swindler because I haven't cured him. Gentlemen, who is the swindler—the arch fiend?"

The crowd cheered him again and again, while the farmer made all haste to get out of sight, and after peace had been restored the fakir held up one of the bottles and said:

"Now, then, who takes the first bottle? Compounded by a South American hermit from herbs and roots grown in a mysterious valley and I'll give $100 for any complaint it won't cure. This is my twenty-third farwell tour and the sales have been 40,000,000 bottles. Patented in every country on earth and the recipients of sixty-four royal decorations. Only a dollar a bottle and who takes the first?"—New York Sun.

Anti-Students Club.

The young ladies of Bethlehem, in this State, have organized an anti-students' club, the object of which is to discountenance the attentions of students, on the ground that they are gay deceivers and delights in breaking feminine hearts and blasting matrimonial hopes. That the study of the classics and of mathematics should conduce to such fickleness is a matter of surprise; and the subject is entitled to the serious consideration of the friends of higher education. It may be, however, that the girls themselves are partly responsible for this condition of affairs. A cap and gown sometimes attract silly little moths, just as a naval or military uniform does, and in the consciousness of power wings are sure to be sinned. There are doubtless good young men in Bethlehem inside as well as outside of college. Give them a chance, girls.—Philadelphia Record.

Must Blame Himself.

New York Herald: Mr. Stiploby—Well, madam, you made a fool of me when I married you; that's dead sure.

Mrs. Stiploby—Why, Nicodemus, long before we were married you always boasted that you were a self-made man. So don't blame me.

The banana plant has been found to contain a greater quantity of pure fibre than any of the other numerous vegetable products used for paper making.

ON A GRAVE SUBJECT.

Some Quaver and Quaint Efforts of Ordinary Poets.

Buffalo News: Simple scriptural quotations were once not considered sufficient for inscriptions, and graveyard poetry was of more importance than at present. Following are a few which were evidently "original":

Here lies the body of Deborah Dent; She kicked up her heels and away she went. A most indecorous proceeding on the part of the woman with the demure name.

Another equally flippant inscription is: Here lies the body of Mary Gray; She would if she could, but she could not stay. She had two bad legs and a baddish cough; Her legs it was that carried her off.

After all, most people are carried off by their legs, though not precisely in that way.

A really clever inscription is that found on a photographer's tombstone:

Here I lie—taken from life.

Another bright and concise bit is found upon the tomb of a husband and wife in a French cemetery:

I am anxious, expecting you.—A.D. 1887. Here I am.—A.D. 1887.

A reprehensible play upon names is: Here lies the body of Solomon Podd. Who shelled out his soul and went up to God. Even more irreverent is the following:

Here lies the body of old Cragier. Who had a mouth from ear to ear. Stranger! step lightly o'er the sod. For it is ye jaws you're gone—by—!

Here lies the Smith—to wit—Tam Gouk, His father, and his mother, W. Tam and Jock, and Joan and Nool, And a' the Gouks theather. When on the yird Tam and his wife Greeted dearer ill wi' ither, But without e'en an air or strife They take their nap thegither.

The above suggests the discord that only died out with the strain of life.

Here lies John Meadow. Who passed away like a shadow. N.B.—His name was Field, but it would not rhyme.

This was intended to be solemn, but some way it isn't. Wild, shield or yield would have rhymed with Field, but evidently the poet was "stuck" on shadow.

Here rests in silent clay Miss Arabella Young, Who on the day of May Began to hold her tongue.

Arabella should rise and haunt this poet.

Here lies Margaret Sexton, Who never did ought to vex one; Not like the woman under the next stone. Margaret must have fixed this up before she died.

The "ruling passion" is apparent in the following:

1869. Alexander Meffen, Chief Constable, sailing. Our life is but a winter day. Some only breakfast and away. Others to dinner say. And are full fed. The oldest man but sups And goes to bed. Large is his debt. That lingers out the day. He that goes soonest Has the least to pay.

Budget of Scotch News.

Mr. Peter McGlashan, a well-known Scotch reporter, was run over by a train and killed near Perth on the 20th ult.

The Cameron Highlanders celebrated the anniversary of Tel-el-Kebir at Edinburgh Castle on Saturday, the 13th ult.

At a special meeting of the Town Council of Glasgow on the 19th ult., it was resolved to confer the freedom of the city upon Lord Rosebery.

The Rev. John McNeill, of Regent Square Church, London, preached to about 3,500 people in the Grand Hall of the Edinburgh Exhibition on the 14th ult.

A stained glass window has been placed in St. Giles' Cathedral, Edinburgh, to the memory of the late Mrs. Cameron Lees. The subject is the Christian virtues.

Mr. Thomas Nelson, of Friars' Carse, Dumfries, died there on the 19th ult. in his 84th year. Mr. Nelson had a successful business career in Carlisle, where he owned large marble works, and was for several years Mayor of the city.

The late Rev. Dr. Robert Stevenson, Dalry, Ayrshire, bequeathed £2,500 towards the endowment of West Church there; £2,500 to the funds of Kersland Barony Church and school; and £2,000 to the University of Glasgow, besides smaller bequests.

The death is announced of Mr. George Cousin, formerly one of the Magistrates of Edinburgh, which took place on the 17th ult. at his residence, 5 Bruntsfield Terrace. Mr. Cousin was born in Leith in 1807, and had just entered upon his 84th year.

Patrick Allan-Fraser, of Hospitalfield, near Arbroath, died on the 17th ult. after a long illness. He for many years took a prominent part in public business in the county of Forfar, and was known as an artist and a painter of art. He was a native of Arbroath, and was born in 1813.

In Dundee Mr. W. E. Baxter's will has been published. Mrs. Baxter gets the interest of £50,000, the contents of the mansion house of Kincaidrum, Inverkeithy, Kilmarnock or Ashcliff, and possession of Inverkeithy or Ashcliff. The heritable property goes to the sons, and there are legacies to the daughters and several servants.

Readers will regret to hear of the death on the 18th ult., at Edinburgh, of the Rev. Charles Rogers, D. D., LL. D., who in his patriotic labors, to perpetuate the memories of Scottish heroes had made himself known to all Scotchmen both at home and abroad. That he had consecrated his life mission, and in connection with it he about twelve years ago spent several months in this country and Canada. He was a son of the Rev. James Rogers, and was born in April, 1825, at Dunmo, Fifeshire.

A Pressing Invitation.

He—I see you are fond of autumn leaves, Miss Breezy.

She—Yes; there is a world of romance to me in the colored leaf.

He—Can we not share the romance between us?

She—Yes, Mr. Freshly; I should be delighted. Come around this evening and sit on the family bible.—Judge.

—Long haired children are not as ubiquitous as formerly. Tangled curls and crimped tresses have come to be regarded among the luxuries and vanities that hamper comfort and convenience.

A YALE AND HARVARD GAME.

How a Baseball Match Was Unexpectedly Won.

Of all games in which I have played, the most remarkable for a sudden reversal of feeling was one between Harvard and Yale played upon Jarvis Field, in June of 1882.

Yale went first to the bat but failed to score. Harvard followed suit. In the second inning, a muff by the Harvard first base man followed by the Yale catcher's making a "two-bagger" hit gave Yale a run. Our happiness was short-lived, however, for in the third inning Harvard made two runs, followed by another in the fifth. Yale scored one in the seventh, but Harvard matched it with one in the eighth, so that we began the ninth with Harvard four to Yale's two. I think we had not the least hope of winning.

I remember feeling, as we came in for the ninth inning, that this defeat would settle our chances of the championship, and thinking how the crowd of boys who, as I knew, were sitting on the Yale benches awaiting the news, would hear it and dwindle away in silence to their rooms. Our first man at the bat in the ninth inning went out quickly; and our catcher followed, with the same result. Wilcox, the last man on our batting list, came to the bat. Two men out, two runs to reach even a tie, and three to win! I noticed that the crowd was leaving the field, and that the young rascal who had charge of our bats was putting them into the bag.

Here, you! I said that!" cried I, for we all were superstitious about packing up the bats before the last man was out. Besides, I was the next batter, if Wilcox should by any chance reach his base, and I wanted my bat. "Two strikes," I heard the umpire call, and then at the next ball, to my great joy, "Take your base," and Wilcox trotted away to first. I remember thinking how much I would give for a home-run, and then there came a good ball just off my shoulder, and I hit it with all my power. It went between third and short-stop on a swift drive, but bounded high, as I afterward learned, for I was meanwhile running at my best speed towards first. When I was fifteen feet from that base, I saw the baseman give a tremendous jump up into the air and I knew somebody had made an overthrow. How I ran then!—for every base I passed I knew was one nearer to tying the score. As I came dashing past third base, I saw Wilcox just ahead of me, and we crossed the home-plate within three feet of each other. Our next batter took his base on poor pitching and stole second; the next followed with a base-hit past second which brought the first runner home with the winning run. We then went into the field, put three Harvard men out and won the game—when probably half the seven thousand spectators were already on their way home with a victory for Harvard in their minds.—Walter Camp, in St. Nicholas for October.

A Cabman's Opinion of Women.

Said an old cabman: "I have been standing in Forty-second street here since 1867, and never have I had an extra ten cent piece from a woman. They are all alike and their name is close. I never drive one that she doesn't want to go like an engineer, and if I demand extra pay for the time made over the road she will hold back and fight with her mouth every time. They all want their money's worth. If they agree to travel at mile rates and doubt my estimate of the distances I have to wait while they go into a drug store or telegraph office for points, and then I lose more time than the difference amounts to. If they hire me by the hour they will hold the cab till the full hour is up. I never knew one of them to cheat in the time, and never met one who paid for a fraction over. A man will allow me half an hour or half a dollar occasionally to get back to the stand, but a woman never pays for anything she doesn't get. Unless she is with a man I don't care much about carrying her."—New York World.

How to Eat Peaches.

"The art of eating a peach" is, it appears, one of the questions of the day. According to one authority on the etiquette of the dinner table a peach should be picked with the fork, quartered, peeled and eaten piecemeal. But as so much manipulation would evidently leave all the juice of the fruit on the plate, this method, so be palatable, requires the courage of the young lady in the story who, at her first appearance at a dinner party, raised her dessert plate with her two hands and calmly drank the sweet juice of the nectarines. The French rule of eating peaches will, therefore, be accepted with much favor, and that rule is, "D'y mordre a pleines dents."—Pall Mall Budget.

A Fool at Large.

The following letter, dated St. Paul, has been received at the Free Press office, Winnipeg:

"St. Paul, October, 1890.—Dear Sir, I have heard about Winnipeg, and I am going to be there on October 16th. I am well known as Jack the Ripper, and I am going to do some work there. I am going to kill three women and one man. Look out for me, and don't forget October 16th. JACK-THE-RIPPER. Good-bye until you see me."

It Stands Much Murdering.

"Do you know what the dead languages are, Willie?" asked the minister.

"Yep. Latin, Greek and English."

"English?"

"Y-ep. English is dead, too. Pa said you murdered it in your sermon last Sunday."

An Absurd Query.

Burlington Free Press: He (reading)—Then their lips met, and— She (interrupting)—Was it a protracted meeting, I wonder?

So great is the prosperity of the First Presbyterian Church at Cleveland, O., that it employs three hard-working clergymen. The oldest man in England, who has just died at Elgin, attributed his good health and longevity to oatmeal, whiskey, tobacco and fresh air.

Justice McMahon opened the Bruce Asizes at Walkerton yesterday. A girl of 17, named McDonald, brought an action for seduction against a married man named Williamson and secured a verdict with $500 damages. The parties reside in Southampton.