the first conference of the Gilghit commander with the Viceroy. In the summer of 1889 the knowledge of Russian intrigues in the vicinity of the Pamir led to Col. Durand being invested with unusual lati-tude of discretion and to his being appointed British agent at Gilghit. The Viceroy's visit to Kashmir, undertaken about the same time, and which was the subject of much speculation, had the same incentive. England has not been idle in the work of proselytizing the tribesmen of that disputed region, but in some important persons murdered are: Miss A. H. SUICIDE FOLLOWS ROBBERY.

HAD STOLEN JEWELRY.

A London cable says : Society is stirred up over a tragedy of international interest. involving a mysterious robbery jewels from the American legation and the death by suicide of the English butler, who was suspected of the crime. Minister Lincoln some time ago engaged as butler at the American legation an Englishman named John Thompson. The references given by Thompson were first-class. He had been assistant butler at Woddeson Manor for Baron Ferdinand Rothschild, the son of the late Baron Anselm Rothschild, of Frankfort, and brother-in-law of Lord Rothschild. In that place he had given complete satisfaction, a fact which would have recommended him to any house in England, and his certificate of character showed that he was implicitly trusted in a household where jewelry was a conspicuous feature. Minister Lincoln was pleased to be able to get a butler of such unexceptionable character, and reposed the same confidence in Thompson that his former employer had. About a month ago Mrs. Bradley Martin, the noted American society leader, was a guest at the legation of Mr. and Mrs. Lincoln. A valuable diamond spray was missing during Mrs. Martin's stay. It was an article on which Mrs. Martin set value, apart from its intrinsic worth, which was large, as indicated by the reward of £500 which she offered for its recovery. A most minute search was made throughout the legation, but no trace of the jewell was found. The butler was not suspected in connection with the matter, and no one thought of asking him any questions. Great was the surprise, therefore, of Minister Lincoln when, about a week after the loss of the diamond spray, Thompson went to Scotland yard and confessed that he was the thief who had taken Mrs. Martin's hardly be added, is not on the tapis at render himself for punishment; that ever since the robbery his conscience had been tormenting him, and so forth. Notwithstanding the confession, the police had their doubts. The man's story was not altogether coherent. Minister Lincoln apperently believed in the insanity theory, for he insisted that Thompson should be released, and Thompson went forth to the world an English house servant without a character. He sought employment, but was unable to secure any engagement except the care of an empty house in Onslow gardens. On Tuesday evening he said to his wife: "I am feeling tired, I think I will lie down." He then went upstairs, and a few moments after his wife heard a noise which aroused her suspicion that something was wrong. She rushed upstairs. The blood was flowing from a horrible wound in her husband's throat, and he was still hacking away, as if determined to make sure work of it. As she ran toward him he fell dving in her arms, and the blood splashed over her dress. He tried to kiss her, and in a few moments was dead.
