"Nowflayme." "Now I lay me down to sleep," How to-night fond memories keep, Round my soul their wings of care, As I breathe my childhood's prayer.

Once I lisped it at her knee, Who is miles apart from me, But her lips are on my brow, And the past is with me now.

Once I almost smiled to see, Words so simple learned by me; Ah! My heart has found since then They're the mightiest words of men.

"Now I lay me down to sleep, I pray the lord my soul to keep"; Guard my feet from sin and strife, Keep me in the way of Life.

"If I die before I wake, May the Lord my spirit take." Here all creeds may meet and blend Faith's beginning and its end.

Peace, my heart, and cease to weep;
"Now I lay me down to sleep."
And my head is on thy breast,
Father! Father! this is rest.

WALKING IN APRICA.

three Women Who Are Not Afraid of Wild

Three women footed it in July and August last from the Indian Ocean 200 miles to Mashonaland. They were members of an Episcopal order, says the New York Sun, and were trained nurses sent out to take charge of the hospital which has been started in that new country. The bishop of Mashonaland expected that provision would be made to carry these young women into the interior, but the force of porters was unexpectedly small and the women said they would endeavor to walk. With extraordinary courage they set out on the journey. There was no waggon road and for much of the way no paths were found. The party suffered terribly at times from thirst. At night the bush was always alive with lions, hyenas, buffaloes, leopards and other animals. At one time the party observed two lions drinking quietly thirty rods from them. The grass often exceeded twelve feet in height for miles and miles, and some days the little caravan marched through incessant rain. They suffered severely from the desertion of their porters, and of the thirty-two carriers with whom they started only four remained at the end of their journey. The women had no tents to sleep in, and altogether they made the journey under conditions which would have tried the strength and courage of the toutest men. They safely reached their destination, however, and they are the first white women to have made such a journey into the interior of Africa, the others travelling either on steamboats or being carried on hammocks or chairs.

The Milrov lectures this year were on the natural history and prevalence of diphtheria. The lecturer gave it as his opinion that soil and geological formation have something to do with its prevalence; that it is especially common in damp valleys, and that in England it is most prevalent during the three last months of the year.

The greatest number of the persons attacked are between 2 and 12 years of age, and the liability is greatest between 2 and 5

The probable explanation of the occurby scarlatina affords a soil favorable for the reception of the diphtheritic poison.

When diphtheria does occur in connection with scarlatina, it is almost always as a sequel to it. So, too, the sore throats due to bad hygienic surroundings and imperfect drainage furnish excellent soil for diphtheritic microbes.

Many cases of diphtheria end unexpectedly in fatal heart failure, sometimes when the patient has seemed in a fair way to recovery. In such cases a post-mortem him four $1 bills and silently passed them examination reveals a fatty and granular through the window. degeneration of the muscular fibres of the

This fact emphasizes the need of prompt treatment to secure the speediest possible recovery. It follows, too, that in all cases, until complete recovery, everything should be avoided which makes demands on the heart, a very slight effort being often fatal; and that the physician should always make a careful examination of the heart, and advise accordingly. - Youth's Companion.
