IMPROVING THE FARM FLOCK

It frequently happens that a man and his wife are not in perfect harmony on the poultry question. The wife, whose work is with the chickens, is interested in having a flock of which she may be proud, a uniform lot, a little better than her neighbor's. The husband may object on the ground that he has no money to put into pure-bred poultry; he may even tell how his mother paid the grocery bill and clothed the family with a flock not as good as theirs. On a great many farms this is true, and, as there are many who feel the need of better poultry and who would like to improve their flock of mixed chickens without putning any money into the work, I will give in as brief a space as possible a method wherehy the desired results may be ob-

To begin with, cull the floak carefully: look at the rear first for signs of straining about the vent and bagging down, as with overfat, and reject a such birds; as also any that have grock ed breast bones. Choose birds with long breast bones. Along the keel is where the best meat lies. Examine the beads als. Choose the birds with right, round alert eyes, the quick moving ones, these that are always first at the feed paff. Reject long-heaked, snake-headed birds, the lines with the dull eyes, and these that sit on the roost through the day When the flock has been culled as shove suggested, cull again, cheosing six or eight of the best birds as a uniform type for a breeding pen. Take the best of the old male birds and the same house and run, but the house may be a dry goods box; and if a run is absolutely out of the question for lack of means to enclose it, give the breeders and the laying hens range on alternate days, or for a time give the breeders only free range. Many a pen of fine birds has lost its usefulness as breeders because of being confined too closely through the breeding season. If from all the hens there are but one or two from which you care to breed, furnish these with a house and yard, and put the male with them for a few hours only each day.

If the male is put with the heas early in the morning, it is said the progent will be mostly males; if he be put with them in the afternoon or toward evening the progeny will be mostly females. Also a mating of a cockerel with hens produces pullets, and of pullets with cock birds produces cockerels. Small breeding pens give excellent opportunities for ex periment, and if a notebook is kept the record of such matings makes very interesting and valuable reading. Whatever else is done, look for vigor and constitution in the birds. A hen that does not have a good constitution will never be a good egg producer; a male without a good constitution will never breed good egg producers. If a flock of mixed chickens lacks constitu tion, they are practically worthless, 3 nuisance and an expense about the place Some short-sighted breeders of pure breds will sacrifice constitution to beauty of feathers, fancy lacing—pure silvery white, rich deep buff, but in the long run they lose by it.
