MODERN WARFARE

With Royal Commanders For From the South.

An excellent idea of what a modern land battle is like was obtained during the French army maneuvers, when General Nicholson (Chomel), commanding the 5th army of the Southern army, did not see a regiment during the five days on the final day of the battle at the end of a line.

The General's headquarters on the last day were in a pleasant way-side inn, which extended behind the firing line. A large scale map of the region was spread upon a table, a row of telephones was on a wall in the dining room, and on the other side of the room, and wireless instruments cranked in an outbuilding. Messengers arrived in the morning, bringing the reports of the divisions.

It takes a whole week of reading and talking to describe the wonderful things that doctors have been doing in all parts of the world, merely within the last 12 months.
