The Business Man and His Stationary

"Is the cobbler's son well-shod?" The merchant eucourages us always to buy s good article in preference to that which may be cheapest-he is right without a doubt, but he often fails to learn this lesson himself-especially is this neticea de in stationery-some envelopes which reach us through the mail are a disgrace to the sender. We wonder if business is measured oftentimes by the class of stationery he sends out-yes, even the quality of paper in the bills he ren ters-we venture to say that there is nothing which points a business points out a business man's carefulness in general make-up more plainy than the quality and the style of the stationary he uses It advertises his standard-it announces clearly to the people what class of goods they may expect at his store. If the mer hant sends out a wishy-washy rag of quality and cheapness in the merhant; stock of goods. Just think over he business firms you are acquainted with and notice the quality of their stationery. And Mr. Business-man, think the morning. this over too and see that you do not suffer for proper attention to this sometimes neglected but very necessary detail.

The Boy on the Farm

Giving the boy on the farm an interes in the product of his work is the curest method of impressing upon him the fact a sense of responsibility, and he realizes that upon his exertions depends the ele ments of profit and loss. Left to his own devices, he soon learns to extricate from difficulty, each of which he begins to look upon as a part of his education. Seldom does a man who has had this kind of bandling in his yonth voluntarily leave the busines of husbandry. If he does, it is more likely necessitated by the fact of physical incapacity to maintain the high speed of his early years. Many men do not play enough, and when they ought to be in their prime are broken down with too much work The fault is their own and not that of the calling. Yet it makes an unfavorable impression upon those to whom the farm might otherwise hold out some allurements.

PERCIVAL SPENCER WAS MASTER OF HIGH ALTITUDES.

Celebrated Aeronaut and Balloon Manufacturer, Who Died Recently In Britain, Inherited His Love For High-Flying From His Grandfather and Father-Used Balloon In War

Of almost world-wide reputation as balloonist, which career he started at the early age of eight, Mr. Percival Spencer, of Spencer Bros., the famous balloon manufacturers, died at his home, Aberdeen Park, Highgate, N., (Eng.) at the age of 48. Mr. Spencer, who was a widower, was the eldest of three brothers, who conduct the business of balloon manufacturers at Highbury, and he was a daring and successful aeronaut. Mr. Spencer must have spent more time in the air than any contemporary aeronaut. He said quite recently that he thought ballooning was the safest way of traveling in the world. And he recommended it for jaded nerves. He also said that a day aloft did one as much good as a week or even a fortnight of any other sort of relaxation. The Spencers are a ballooning family

Mr. Spencer's grandfather made as cents as far back as 1836, and his son carried on the family tradition by making an ascent at the Crystal Palace when only eight years old. On that occasion he was accompanied by his father, and afterwards he made balloon ascents and parachute descents in Egypt, India, the Straits Settlements, China, and Japan. He made special ascents that were witnessed by the Czar of Russia and the Emperor of Japan. Mr. Spencer was a familiar figure not only at the Crystal Palace, but also at fetes and galas throughout the country. On seven occasions he crossed the Channel by balloon, and he has flown across the Irish Sea from the Isle of Man to Scotland. From ballooning Mr. Spencer passed enthusiastically to the airship problem, and he believed that he was the first balloonist to take an active part in military aeronautics. The occasion was the war in Acheen, Sumatra, is 1890. Accompanied by Major Droese, of the Dutch Army, he made a series of investigations that afforded useful information to the Netherlands officers. During part of the operations the balloon, attached to the last truck of an armor-plated train, was drawn through dense tropical forests. When the aerostat was liberated it rose high in the air and showed the position of the enemy's forces, and at a given signal the guns of the forts poured out shot and shell on the native insurgents. The effects were noted from the balloon and orders issued to the forces below. In the pursuit of his profession he had many thrilling experiences. One of his most serious occurred in India. He made an ascent outside Calcutta and came down in the jungle. Quite outside his bearings, and with no knowledge of his whereabouts, Mr. Spencer wandered about the jungle for three days. When eventually he found his way into Calcutta, he was so emaciated and weak that he was thought by the natives to be a ghost, and was so described by them. In Japan he fell with his balloon into the ocean, and was only saved from drowning through the timely appearance of a boat from a battleship.
