A LONG CHASE.

Went 25,000 Miles for Rare Butterfly.

A telegram from Chicago revealed the interesting story of a 25,000 mile chase for a butterfly, told by Mrs. William Certeton Yange, wife of an English entomologist connected with the French Institute of Enfomology, who is on her way to join her husband in New York. Mrs. Yange said her husband had made the journey of 25,000 miles for the sole purpose, catching one butterfly, one we have had the most extraordinary creates in land values, would be far to better the conditions of the man with $500 good fortune. The actual classification of the butterfly I do not know, but I know he has two spots in each upper wing, which render him exceedingly desirable. Moreover, he is enugly done up in a tin box hermetically scaled and would bring joy to entomologists whose collections lack this particular specimen. We have been butterfly-chasing from Paris to Kioto, and got our little bombyx in the garden of a Japanese gentleman's residence at Kioto after pursuing him twelve months." Some of blue, sulphur, cabbage, anglewing, painted lady, zebra swallowtail, silverspot, peacockj, wood swallowtail, wood nymph, milkweed, tiger swallowtail, mourning cloak, and red-spotted purple. The naturalist could not at first find the bombyx on the kind of a butterfly he sought: but he did not cease his search nor his journey around the world, till he had found his specimen. - Christian Herald.

The Japanese Compositor.

The workers in the composing rooms of the Japanese journals are confronted by a complicated task. The printing of those journals is done in two languages, the "Kana" and the square characters serving as a key to the other. The square characters are based on Chinese ideographs, and prasent a mixture of geometric figures and crosses.

It is said that in Japan there are from four thousand to five thousand of these ideagraphs in everyday use. It follows, therefore, that the Jap compositor must be something of a scholar, from the Oriental standpoint, at least, to recognize these characters at sight. In order to lighten his task he has adopted the following disposition of the work. He seats himself at a table, upon which are spread the 47 Kana characters. As copy is received he cuts it into small strips and hands each strip to a boy. This lad proceeds along the composing room until he has finally collected from a number of cases arranged in files the different ideographs desired. Some seven or eight boys are thus employed, and as they proceed here and there in search of the idecgraphs they maintain, for some unknown reason, a curious chant.

At last all the ideographs called for are placed before the compositor. He dishes out the corresponding types in the Kana character, and finally sets up the whole for "proving." These proofs are sung aloud by one reader to

With a simple record system, there is no valid reason why a dairy farmer should harbor the type of cow that is reluctant to pay her way; with systematic records of the yield of each cow, he is in a position to build up a herd in which each individual pays a good profit To increase the profit per cow means to increase the interest of farm life and the real joy of living. Would you not rather keep cows giving thirty dollars profit than those giving only one dollar profit?
