The Death of an Autumn Day The autumn-day is dying now, The hand of pain lies on her brow; And hark! A tearful touching ring Is in the church-bells' echoing. Trees one-time gowned in brilliant dress Are clad in robes of dark distress: In sympathy each creeping vine Bends low. And see! the stately pine Sways to and fro in bitter grief, For her whose lovely life was brief; And hush! The wailing of a prayer

Comes mournfully upon the air. As trees implore, but all in vain, They cannot loose the hand of Pain; And Autumn, who much kindness gave, Will soon be lying in her grave.

The Autumn-day, no more shall bless OUR PASTRY COUNTER IS AL. With words of pleasant tenderness, For weeping Winds now sadly moan, M. Aileen Ward.

The money was hidden so successfully that she forgot all about it herself, and when a dealer came along the other day and offered to buy the arm chair for two dollars, she cheerfully let him have it. About two hours later, Mrs. Allenby happened to recall that there was $85 in good Canadian money hid in the bottom of that chair. She immediately made tracks for the shop of the dealer on James street, and asked to see the chair which had been taken away. There was a moment of anxious suspense while she ransacked among the lining of the chair bottom. The money was gone! No, it wasn't.
