The Experience of One Who Knows and Places Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills First.

It is not difficult to acquire a medicine that will effect movement of the bowels. To cure Constipation and the complications which arise from it is another matter.

A GIFT OF A SOUL

But Jacques has not forgotten him. Did you note his suffering when I spoke to him of his friend? His face, a moment before so fresh and smiling, was ghastly and distorted.

What are you afraid of? The anger of some jealous tyrant? Or perhaps you had not confidence in my discretion?

"Do you believe it was on some other person's account, then?" she asked, resuming his seat on the sofa beside her.

"Do you not know that it was?" she looked at him fixedly; he turned his head away, but seizing his arm with authority.

"It was with me he spent his last evening," she said "it was to me he addressed his last words. I know what everyone else, even Davidoff, is ignorant of, Pierre, weary of his feverish existence, disillusioned regarding his genius, and hopeless of the future, grew despondent, and in obedience to a notion that he had conceived, he resolved to sacrifice his life for the sake of a beloved friend."

"Be sensible, or I shall send you back to your friends." "How can one be sensible near you?" he cried, smiling. "Ask something that is possible, not something that is impossible."

ed around. Only Patrizzi was near him. "I am losing my senses," he said to himself. He took the arm of the prince, and saying with feverish eagerness, "Come, let us go," he drew him away.

Next day when he awoke in his chamber at the villa of Beaulieu, he found himself alone. He had been taken about 11 o'clock in the morning, he had only a vague recollection of what had taken place the night before.

He remained thus for a time, enjoying the mere sense of being; then, springing at a bound from the bed, he began to dress. He went about his room, humming an air, careless and happy. He opened his window, and the warm breeze entered and played around his brow.

Her eyes were cast on the ground with an air of sadness, and she seemed, in her dark gown, as if she were mourning for her lost happiness.

A FINE COMPLEXION

May Be Had Through the Use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People.

A girl's complexion is something more than a matter to concern her vanity. It is an indication of the state of her health.

"You returned home late," she said. "It is hardly prudent for you to sit up so late, when you have so recently recovered from your illness."

"You enjoyed yourself, at least?" she asked. "DE do not abuse your health, my child. Do not be ungrateful to Providence who has restored it to you. And do not add to my anxieties. I am troubled enough about your sister's condition."

The sound of his mother's voice drew him from his meditation. "Besides," she added, "even if the doctor were here, would Juliette follow his directions? When she is asked about her health she answers that she is not ill, that she is only a little tired; that there is no cause for anxiety. But this very unconsciousness makes me all the more uneasy, because in it I see the indication of a moral cause for her malady, more difficult to combat than any physical one."

"A moral cause!" repeated Jacques. "Yes, the child has a secret grief and notwithstanding the courageous efforts she makes to conceal it, she cannot deceive me. Each morning I see that she is paler than she has been during the night. And it has been so for the past two months. Oh, I know the exact date of the commencement of her malady. It has remained indelibly fixed upon my memory. It is both a sad and a happy one for me for it marks at once the beginning of your recovery and the beginning of the illness of your sister. Yes, Juliette received the blow from which she is now suffering on the day when Dr. Davidoff came to announce to us the death of Pierre Laurier."

If Madame de Vignes had been observing Jacques she would have been terrified by the look of anguish that distorted his features. What he had already vaguely suspected his mother had put into words. The death of Pierre had produced at once a salutary and a pernicious effect; it had restored him to life and given her death-blow to Juliette.
