British Drink Control Increases Efficiency.

"It is important to call attention to the fact that this British control measure never for a moment was permitted to masquerade in the guise of a social reform," says Edward Marshall in a despatch to the Montreal Daily Star, under the heading "British Drink Control Increases Efficiency." "It was avowedly a war measure and nothing more than that. It is open to any where required in the judgement of the authorities to prevent inefficiencies in the nation's emergency work due to overdrinking on the part of the workers.

"The efficiency of these regulations instantly became apparent and has been responsible in a large measure according to the admission of practically everyone concerned, for the enormously increased munitions increase and output.

Throughout London and particularly in the area affected by the measure it is apparent to the most casual observer that drunkenness has very markedly decreased. In two weeks I have not seen a drunken man upon the streets of London, nor, during an extensive tour of the poorer quarters, did I see a single obviously drunken woman, in or out of a public house.

The moral effect of all this has been roughly estimated through a study of the statements made by chief constables in the scheduled areas. In the Autumn the officials held a conference and on the occasion of this meeting it was generally agreed that public order has been greatly improved, that streets were in a generally better condition of order than they had been under the old regime and that no important difficulties anywhere had been found in the enforcement of the law. Social workers, particularly those of the Salvation Army, report that the homes of the poor are brighter than ever they have been before and that the childrenn of the poor are cleaner and better clothed than they have been before. The effect upon the criminal rate is even more marked than the effect upon mere drunkenness. The reduction of crimes attributable to drunkenness has amounted to 60 or 70 per cent. in the same areas wherein the reduction in arrests for mere drunkenness has amounted to but 50 or 60 per cent.
