CANADIAN BIG GAME AT HOME

THE camera brings the features of big game and their haunts to our residents. All along the Rocky Mountains strange wild beasts roam in abundance. Many of them are not familiar to the human eye at all, but there are others with which every sportsman is acquainted. Perhaps there is no place in the Dominion so interesting from the point of view of the hunter as the Canadian Pacific Rockies with their majestic snow-capped peaks, 66 of which are over 11,000 feet high. At Banff there is a big National Park where nobody may intrude in pursuit of game, for a wise Government has decided that big game must not be hunted indiscriminately, and has instituted laws for their protection. But outside the preserve the hunter is free to enjoy his sport, and there is plenty of it to be had: the grizzly bear, mountain goat, wild mountain sheep and lynx take up their abode in large numbers in these parts. In the open seasons many a party sets out with guides and ponies from Banff. The spring is the best time to hunt the grizzly bear when his fur is still thick after the winter's sleep. Often it is difficult to bag him but his skin is a trophy of which any hunter may be proud. It is a pretty sight to watch a wild goat as he stands on some cliff seemingly admiring the picturesqueness of the landscape that lies beneath him. While in pursuit of the Rocky Mountain goat the hunter has to take some serious risks: he has to ascend precipitous crags hanging on almost by the skin of his teeth. The goat can dash along from rock to rock with the same gracefulness and velocity as that displayed by a bird travelling from twig to twig on some adjacent fir tree. But it is the danger and excitement of the chase that gives the hunter the greatest delight. It is as difficult to shoot the bighorn or wild mountain sheep. After feasting himself on the lowlands in the grey early morning the bighorn ascends to the fastnesses of the mountains. It is almost an impossible task for the hunter to get within range, and if ever he does get there he must not make the least noise or show himself, for the bighorn is both timid and observant, and when he is started once there is little chance of again coming into close quarters with him. The bighorn's flesh is pronounced by epicures to be most delicious and his horns make very beautiful ornaments. In its cosy coat of soft ash grey fur the lynx seems to be like a cat, and he certainly is of the cat family. He is rather pretty, and though not such a prize trophy for the sportsman as some of the bigger forest neighbours, he is always welcome to a rifle bullet.
