TENTED LIFE in the ROCKIES

(1) Alpine Club in Yoho Park. (2) Around the Camp Fire. (3) Chinese Cooks on the Job. (4) Tents in Yoho Park.

Full cheer of living, for the most complete emancipation from the bondage of civilized life, give me the tented life in the Canadian Pacific Rockies.
Only a bit of cotton between one and the stars, only a spread of balsam between you and mother earth. But the world is yours, the wonder-world of mountains, of glaciers, of glittering snow fields, of stinging brooks and pouring rivers, of valleys brilliant with flowers, of sleeping lakes of everlasting colors.
With a guide, a pack and a saddle, a supply of food and a tent or two, we leave Haunt or Field and face the alpine trail and the untrodden paths. Miles and years behind are cities and streets and trains and automobiles and city newspapers and even the busy hum of the great world.
over as many kinds of paths as you can count on fingers and toes, the first camp is struck and none too soon, for the tenderfoot who hasn't been in the saddle for some years. Bill chooses an ideal spot as if by instinct—a clean bit of forest, a high and dry level area, a near-by stream, a pasture run for the ponies and firewood for the burning pile.
Then one enters upon the tented life and a rare life it is. How tiny the little tent in the world of hills, but it is Home for the time. No sooner is it pegged down than Bill has by magic started a roaring fire going and set free the most delicious odors for the epicurean feast that soon follows. A fallen tree serves as a makeshift table, a stump or two as upholstered chairs and what more would you have? We usually can get about without finger bowls or napkins. Could a cannibal be greedier than we are, as the bacon and the bread and the prunes disappear and the black old tea pot never runs dry. Then the camp fire! What witchery in the erratic flames with which the mountain winds are playing, what thrills of physical well-being as we fire-worship. Men purr like well-fed cats and are unashamed. Then the camp fire symposium: the tales, true and less true, the stinging, classic and otherwise, and such good fellowship as is rare!
So to bed. Three in a row. The centre sleeper in his sleeping bag looks like a stuffed giant, the rest of us are content with the warm Hudson's Bay blankets of ample folds. No, we didn't sleep much the first night, but the change of life and environment had been the greatest, but wait for the other nights. Children wails on the campers until the morning wash in the ice cold stream makes a complete awakening. And what a day it is, rarer than any picnic day in June in the other part of the world where men crowd together. Trails and paths invite exploration on every hand, mountain slopes rise, come over and climb us for the panoramas we will reveal. Wild life is revealed at times, for it is the haunt of big and small game—bear, mountain goat and sheep, porcupine, marmot, ptarmigan, eagle.
The car is thrilled with the songs of stinging streams and tumbling cascades and reverberating avalanches. Truly it is a marvellous world, and the tented life therein, in a little tent, makes one of the happiest experiences of life and one of its most interesting.
