Buying Cattle Feed for Winter Use

The most successful cattle feeders purchase and feed profitably a reasonable supply of mill feeds and concentrates. What feeds to select and when to purchase are at present most difficult problems.
The man who buys meals in small amounts as needed and buys the meal cheapest per hundredweight is a poor business man does not appreciate the real values of feeds.
The feeder who has rich and succulent farm-grown roughages need purchase and feed less grains and meals and the meals purchased need be of a less concentrated nature. The intelligent cattle feeder always raises on his farm the best possible quality of feeds and makes his purchases of grain and meals to balance the rations properly.
There are but two correct methods of choosing meals when purchasing. Which methods to follow depends altogether on the quantity, quality and variety of the farm-grown roughages. Purchases should be made on the basis of the Protein contained in a digestible form or the Total Digestible Nutrients (protein plus starches plus fat x 24).

For example, Red Clover hay contains 152 pounds digestible protein and 1018 pounds total digestible nutrients per ton, timothy hay has only 60 pounds digestible protein and 970 pounds total digestible nutrients per ton, corn ensilage has 22 pounds digestible protein and 354 pounds total digestible nutrients per ton, and mangels or swedes about half as much of each. Clover, or better, alfalfa, hay supplies the protein of a ration in about the correct proportion while Timothy hay must be supplemented with a rich protein meal. Again, corn ensilage, although bulky, supplies the cheapest total nutrients of any feed but requires a protein meal to balance it. Ensilage made from green clover, oats, or oats, peas and vetches, is worth almost as much as good corn silage.

The same relationship exists between all the meals which are purchased for the rearing of stock. The farmer who has grass hay (such as timothy) and corn ensilage, must buy meals on the basis of cheapness of protein. At present prices these in order of cheapness are—cotton seed meal, dried distillers' grains, linseed oil meal, gluten feed, wheat bran, shorts, middlings and oat. If, on the other hand, he has alfalfa or clover hay, corn or other good silage and roots he need purchase less meal and should select on the basis of cheapness of total digestible nutrients. At present prices these in order are:—Dried distillers' grains, beet pulp, wheat middlings and bran, gluten feed, cottonseed meal, linseed oil meal, and oats.

Every farmer can in a few minutes with present feed prices and the analysis of digestible nutrients, verify the above and select his purchases accordingly.
Certainly if he wishes to get the most value for his money he must follow these four rules:—
1. Buy the highest quality feeds, not those containing dirt, filler and indigestible fibre.
2. Buy feeds containing the desirable elements in the cheapest form.
3. Buy co-operatively, in car load lots if possible, and thus save extra freight charges and commissions.
4. Buy when markets are lowest, usually in the summer and fall, and save the storage, handling charges, and, usually, extra profits made by the millers and dealers.
