FOR A DOG FUNERAL

Don't Plan for It Till You Can Write His Epitaph.

Jim Wallbridge, the wealthiest man in Tenawanda, Pa., has buried hisdog at an expense of $500, and is being roasted for extravagance by newspapers all over the country, but the flerce criticism is unwarranted, for the reason that there's no information es to why Jim spent $500 on burying the dog. We don't know Jim's why, but it reminds us of a story about a

Several times we have been ready and willing to spend $500 on burying a dog, the same dog every time. It is small but very hairy, remnant-looking dog, with the mien of a sandtorm in Los Angeles suburbs. This canine has a voice with Caruso depth and Schumann-Heink range, and 11 p. m. to 2 a. m. is his favorite period for rehearsal. He will rehearse because the noon is listening or just because he has a voice, exactly like some humans.

skeleton of a horse, or something equally as good, in our best flowerbed, and, every sunrise throughout the livelong summer, he digs up the bones if they've sprouted.

Diplomat of high order is this dog, He has learned to knock over the family milk-bottle and lap its streaming contents daily, and there to no gun, rock, or club that can draw a bead on him.

One day we started over to the house of the owner of this dog to offer $500, or something mercenary like that, for permission to bury him (the dog). At the third corner we came upon a ragged, starved-looking little girl of perhaps two years of age, sitting in the middle of the sidewalk. She had been crying, as the streaks of tears through the dirt on her face strowed.

Say, tellows, did you ever notice the tear stains on the face of one of these old, old-faced children of the streets? Sometime, pick up one of these babies with the eighty-year-old face and study the stains, the wrinkles, the nopelessness, the dirt. Therein is written the centuries-old story of up the corn first, get its roots separwrong, oppression, and neglect. Therein is the power that makes "the | mighty quick by painting on Putnam's man with the hoe" turn upon his "masters, rulers, kings," at the judgment seat of God and ask his lawful "Why?" Refuse From Coal Mines Now Resorted to for Fuel in the March issue of the Typofrom the "City of Coal Nuggets," Typographical Union will hold its an- songnual convention next summer, furnishes this information, showing that what was at one time considered refuse is now being put on the market. as fuel:

One of the first things that will attract the attention of the delegates and visitors as they approach the city will be the massive black culm piles that look like mountains of coal. These piles are dotted over the valley approaches to the city, and many of them are several hundred feet high and close to a half-mile in length. For years they were the waste of the anthracite industry, but to-day they are worth millions of joilars, and immense fortunes have been made out of them by the men who not so many years back had the foresight to buy them up cheap.

In the early days of the anthracite industry only the larger sizes of coal were deemed burnable, and chestnut and smaller sizes were thrown on the dumps as waste. Improved grates and blowers soon made chestnut burnable, but pea and the smaller sizes were still thrown away. Next a grate was made to burn peaccal, and more recently grates and blowers were perfeeted to burn the smallest sizes, even the coal dust.

When those grates were in process of experimentation men bought up some of the culm piles that were rich in chestnut, pea and smaller coal. The success of the new grates made the dumps an attractive investment. Thirty-five cents a ton was regarded a high price to pay for them.

The perfecting of the grates to burn the small sizes caused a development of the washery process—a new coalpreparing process. The coal on the dumps was washed into buildings and onto screens and shakers that screed out the smaller sizes. The washing is done through a sort of sluice, men with high-powered water hose standing on the dumps and washing the coal into the sluices. Good dumps, that is, dumps rich in coal, give a product that burns as readily as freshmined coal. The dumps with the chestnut and pea sizes are especially rich, that coal being sorted almost the preparing process. The coal on the preakers.

Thousands of cars of washery coal are being shipped from the anthracite region and are helping relieve the coal shortage. The coal brings about the same wrice as fresh-mined coal, so it can be seen that the men who bought the dwars at 35 cents a ton and less are resping a rich harvest.

The countainous culm piles in n-ay instances are disappearing under the water cressure from the hose and the once waste coal is being burned in my a home and factory. But here and there in the region the visitor may see at night what looks like a mountain afire. In some cases cuim piles have been burning for years, the flames eating into the heart of the dump and at night giving off a glow that can be seen for miles. These fires were regarded only as a nuisance up to a few years ago, but to-day they are a great money loss, and efforts are being made to stem them.

When the coal is washed from the dumps and sorted in the washery buildings it gives off a fine silt that flows into the fields near the plants. That silt was regarded as utter waste until a very short time ago. Now it is selling at a dollar a ton at the plant. It is sometimes pressed into briquettes for burning, and a newer method is to dry out the dust and by forcing it through hose over the bed of a fire under a boiler to burn it in suspension. The dust is almost explosive and burns before it reaches the bed of the fire. Railroads are experimenting successfully with this form of coal burning.

The reclamation of the culm piles is one of the romances of the coal industry, an over-night turning of waste into millions of dollars' worth of fuel. But an even later conservation is had by a brick manufacturing company that has established a plant near Scranton, where bricks are made from coal ashes. The ashes are being taken from a mountain-high pile of ashes that was dumped for years from the boiler room of a breaker. Fire bricks that stand every test are made by this company, and its market 12 rapidly spreading.

So when the delegates and visitors see the mountainous-like piles of culm graphical Journal, the correspondent in the valleys near Scranton they may well wish they were here a few years Seranton. Pa., where the International ago when the cuim could be had for a

The Seven Years' War.

At the end of the seven years' war the most noted of Germany's generals nad fallen, hosts of officers had disappeared, and the lands were untilled, the seed corn was eaten, and men hunted men for food. One-sixth of bearing arms were dead; the only laborers in the fields were women and Firls, and these wel-night perishing of starvation. The very cattle for food and agriculture were swept away by famine and disease. Ten per cent. of the whole population were dead. Selection and rejection of men for the army were impossible, and at the close the fighting ranks included whole battalions of deserters from the other side or prisoners captured in the war. -Melbourne "Age."

It is believed that the use of iron was unknown to the more ancient people of the earth; certainly few traces are found. But among the Mexicans there is evidence of red copper having been fashioned into tools, and although that is wonderful enough when the usage is seen to which the comparatively soft metal was put, yet still more marvellous are the tools of volcanic glass which wrought, carved, cut and chiseled the huge images and blocks of stone to be found on Easter Island.
