

BIRD DECEIT.

Tactics of Self-Defence They Are Adept In.

It has been pointed out that the military tactics which a commander may employ to deceive the enemy are practiced in a limited way by many birds.

There is nothing more interesting in the study of bird life than the efforts to deceive which many species put forth to save their young or their nests from the depredator.

The bobwhite (commonly called quail) is a most notable tactician in this kind of deception. This bird is physically helpless in the face of danger, possessing no weapons.

There are sometimes a score of eggs, sharply pointed at one end and round at the other, so that space in the nest is economized.

They inherit a knowledge of the family vernacular, and each little head about the size of a pea, holds quick perception and resolute will.

on them; they are almost invisible among the dry leaves and grass.

The morning dove is another timid and helpless creature; she also tries the broken wing ruse to divert danger from her nest.

The domestic goose is derived from wild species. The pioneer settlers saw their domestic geese run wild in bushes and almost revert to their primitive state.
