SIR WILLIAM'S WILL

Show Mr. Carton in; eh, Clytie? Clytie sprang to her feet, dabbed at her eyes and smoothed her hair.

His voice was low and beautifully modulated; it seemed absolutely appropriate to the place and the occasion.

Clytie's dark lashes swept her cheek—she wondered why he had checked his mind; then she raised her eyes and said:

"I am sorry you have been ill, Mr. Carton. It is very kind of you to come."

Mollie said nothing, but seating herself in a chair, teased the fire with a poker.

"No doubt you have been acquainted, by Mr. Granger, with the contents of Sir William's will," said Hesketh.

"I know nothing of the estate, and I have only just learned that—that—"

"Thank you, Mr. Carton," said Clytie, as the low voice ceased.

"Thank you, no," he replied. "I must get back to the works."

He bent over her hand and left the room. Clytie stood and looked after him, her dark, but fine, brows drawn together.

"Thank goodness, he didn't stay!" she exclaimed.

While he was doing so, her poor, thin hand relaxed its grip of the child, and the young fellow took it from her.

"It is dead!" He hid the best, the sweetest thing he could have done, and gently put the poor little white in her arms.

"I am glad, Yes, I am glad, I have suffered so much—ever since it was born, from the moment it was born."

Presently he said, in a gentler voice, a more tender one, than one would expect from a man of his age.

She looked at him in a dazed fashion for a moment when she made to rise. As he helped her to her feet, he said:

"Give me the child." But she shook her head and pressed the baby closer to her.

"What about?" she asked. "A dog," he said, "is fond of animals, and I get foolish and lose my head when they are ill-treated."

"I believe you," she said; "that's the advantage of having an open countenance, young man. Where have you come from?"

"The Mignon station," he replied. "Why?" she asked, sinking into a chair with a sigh.

"I had a row with a man there." "What about?" she asked.

It was a comfortable and prosperous-looking place, with flowers in the front garden and creepers climbing over the low-browed house.

"This is Parraluna," said the young fellow. "I heard you wanted a hand. You are Mr. Jarrow?"

"Well, I did—I do," he said, hesitatingly. "But I want a single man."

"A woman, come for work—and a—woman. Not his wife, he said."

"Give it to her," she said to her husband. "And you give me that baby."

"The young fellow leaned against a tree and filled his pipe with shaking fingers; for he knew that he must give her a little time.

"She is too ill to answer any questions," she said. "She just had strength to say that her name was Mary Seaton."

"He had risen and come in and was still standing. She noticed an unusual courtesy, and her eyes went up and down him as she motioned him to take his seat."

"I am generally called Jack," he said. "John Douglas," replied the young man.

"I believe you," she said; "that's the advantage of having an open countenance, young man. Where have you come from?"
