Selecting the Breeding Pen

(Experimental Farm Note.)

This time that preparations were under way for the breeding season. The male bird or bird of birds that are to be used for breeding should have been selected before this, and be in prime condition. Great care ought to be exercised in the selection of the male. He is more than half the flock. He alone may mean success or failure. It is also important to use only the best females. Do not breed from the whole flock. Take those out from which good type and vigorous chicks may be expected.

THE BREEDING MALES. Vigorous, well-grown cockerels, the sons of high-producing females, should be used as they are more reliable breeders than aged cocks. This does not mean that cock birds should not be used. They should, but only those cock birds that have shed their vigour and ability to produce strong, high-producing stock.

THE FEMALES. These males should be mated not to the whole flock but to selected hens and to strong, well-grown pullets that have shown by their winter's performance that they have the high laying character.

When the pullets are put into their winter quarters in the fall close tabs on them, and note made of those that start to lay early and are persistent in production. If trap-nests are used, select those birds that make the highest records provide they are suitable in other respects, that is, if they conform to the requirements of the breed.

EXTERNAL MARKS. If trap-nests are not used, dependence will have to be placed on external indications of production for selection.

When a pullet of a yellow-skinned variety such as the Leghorn, Plymouth Rock, Wyandotte or Rhode Island Red, starts to lay, her legs and feet will be more common as well as her skin. As laying progresses she has up the surplus fat in the body, and the various parts begin to show. These changes take place in the following order: The vent cavity enlarges, so that a pale vent indicates and the bird is laying. The egg-ovary, that is the inner ovary of the ovary, is enlarged and is a little more pinkish than the rest. The earlobes of Leghorns and similar white-fleshed birds bleach out a little more slowly than the egg-ovary so that a bleached earlobe means a little longer or greater production than a bleached vent or egg-ovary.

The next change is in the beak. Beginning at the base the colour gradually disappears until it finally leaves the front part of the upper beak. A bleached beak means heavy production for at least the past four or six weeks. The shanks are the last to bleach out so that a bleached shank may be taken as an indication that the bird has been laying for a considerable time.

In the absence of trap-nests, therefore, select those females of suitable type that show by their faded shanks that they have been producing heavily during the winter season. If these birds are in laying condition, the vent will be large and moist, the abdomen distended so that the pelvic arch is so as to give capacity. The abdomen will be soft and pliable.

The hens that will have been reserved for breeders, will be either those that have good trap nest records or that were selected in the fall by appearance. These will have been vigorous, alert, active birds that have been late in molting, that have bleached out shanks and that show the various characteristics previously mentioned.

THE NUMBER OF FEMALES. The number of females to be used will depend on the conditions under which they are kept. For breeds of the general purpose type such as Rocks or Wyandottes, in confinement, eight to twelve females will be enough, and Leghorns, twelve to fifteen females for each male. On free range, the number may be increased fifteen females to twenty-five for the heavier breeds and twenty to thirty for the Leghorns.

FEED WELL. Be sure to supply an abundance of green food and make the birds exercise freely for their grains. Do not feed over-stimulating feeds. See that with the good feeds there are fresh air lots of sunshine and sanitary conditions.
