SIR WILLIAM'S PINK PILLS FOR PALE PEOPLE

"You are a prospector," said Jack. "That's me, sir," assented Chope cheerfully.

He stopped suddenly, as if he felt that he was becoming too communicative, and presently asked Jack if he would tell him of a theatre worth seeing.

"That's all right," responded Jack. "I've been in Australia, too you know, and therefore I claim the privilege of what they call an old chum."

"Yes," he said, "my time's pattering out. Well, I've had a good time, thanks to you, Mr. Jackson."

"A nice place, and nice people," said Jack, "about the nicest people I ever met. They made me well."

he recalled her face, to remember that it had been a happy one. "How much longer have you got?"

"I wouldn't worry about him, if I were you," said Jack, with a shrug of the shoulders, but feeling rather mean.

He lay awake a long time, thinking it over; but he could come to no decision. Chope being otherwise engaged, Jack was left to himself the following night.

Of course he could not take his eyes off her; and the more he looked the more deeply he was impressed by her appearance.

He watched them for a moment or two; then he could stand it no longer, and he sprang up and made his way out of the pit, rather roughly, it is to be feared.
