"I shall never see you again! my hoy, my hoy!" broke from her. Madge waited no longer. White to the lips, with an agony worse than death, she felt her way along the wall of the room and sped swiftly, noiselessly, along the corridor and down the stairs.

No one was in the hall. The servants, even the porter were congregated in the servants' hall discussing with feverish excitement the events of the night; and she went straight to the great door, and opening it, passed out into the night.

It was dark and a keen wind was whistling through the leafless trees. It seemed to her to be singing in a mocking voice, "Irene loved you; she loves you still!"

Madge fastened her shawl around her and stood for a moment, posed, as it were, upon the broad step. Whither should she go? The answer breathed by the same inner voice, seemed to whisper despairingly -"Anywhere from this place, any- I have known?" She was not so where!"

Obeying it, as before, she passed down the steps, and swiftly crossing the lawn-across the light thrown from the windows of the still lighted rooms—was swallowed up in the darkness.

the drive, its wonted smoothness cut up by the carriages. passed the gates | what I was!" Her eyes were dry and and into the high road. She pauced a moment or two to gain breath and looked around her. As she did so, the clock of the Towers struck five. In another hour or two, she reflected, workmen would be about and she would be seen. She must hasten on, but whither? At that omen if any idea at all found room in her bewildered mind it was that of going to her own people. If she walked long enough, if she could only manage to avoid recognition, she must in time come across a band of gypsies. Whether they belonged to her own tribe or not, she knew that they would succor, and, if necessary, hide her.

She hurried on and for a time, supported by the excitemnt, was not sensible of fatigue; but presently she became conscious of it. Her feet seemed to be of lead, her head ached, her eyes burned. She knew that she could not go much further. Suddenly she found herself off the road and upon the grass. She looked around confusedly and saw she was on Gorse Common. As she looked a fain light, attracted her attention, and she realized, after a moment or two, that it was from Martha Hooper's cottage. It seemed like a beacon-not to warn but to welcome; and it occurred to her that she might rest there for a short time, perhaps until the night had fallen again. The woman had evidently known what sorrow was, and would sympathize with her and hide her. It was true that there was some secret understanding between her and the countess, but Madge reflected that she could show Martha Hooper that she, Madge, was flying from Monk Towers to save the countess from further humiliation, and that would induce Mrs. Hooper to help her in her flight. She made her way across the common and, nearly fainting now with the exhaustion produced by the reaction of excitement, she leaned against the door and knocked.

Two or three minutes passedminutes that seemed an age to Madge -and she was asking herself whether she should have strength to keep from falling upon the step, when Martha Hooper's nervous voice was heard from behind the door:

"Who is it? Is it you-Jake?" she asked in trembling tones. Madge moistened her lips; she was almost incapable of speech.

"It is I," she said at last. Mrs. Hooper opened the door, then shrank back and uttered a cry of alarm.

"Who is it?" she righted. "I—I don't know you! I've nothing to "It is !-Mrs. Landon!" said poor

Queer Borneo Names. It must be a matter of difficulty for SEEDS TRAVEL ON THE WINDS

TORONTO

Not many years ago a fertile resion of country was suddenly devastated by the eruption of a volcano. Every vestige of its plant life was destroyed by molten lava and hot ashes. To-day this region is almost thickly covered with a new growth of vegetation. There are many ways by which the seeds of plants are carried great distances to spring into new life wnere conditions are favorable.

It has even been suggested that perhaps the germs of life may be carried about into stellar regions by the pressure of light. It is a well-known fact that particles having a certain area in proportion to their mass can be driven through a vacuum by the preseure of light alone.

Among the most curious methods of seed distribution are those of seeds which are carried through the air on wings, such as the maple, which has two wings, and the catalpa, the elm, the ash and the pine. These seeds do not flap the'r wings like birds. but depend altogether upon the force of the wind to carry them along. Other floating seeds are the milkweed, thistle and dandelion.

The milkweed seeds are concealed in a pod which breaks open and exposes them to the wind. Up they go through the air, each seed carried by a ball of silky down, the threads of which are so frail and diaphanous that one is hardly prepared for their appearance under the microscope. Each thread turns out to be a separate tube ribbed with dark veinlike streaks arranged in an irregular manner. When a milkweed pod bursts open it is much like a miniature aero meet in which scores of white craft soar up into the morning wind. One may marvel at the economical arrangement of the tubes of down, so frail do they seem to carry the heavy looking seed.

Any one crossing the Great Plaine n the autumn will notice the stacks of dry-looking weeds piled up on one side of the fences. When we know that the wind drives them there it is easy to see which way the wind blows in such regions as Kansas and Southern Nebraska. They are the celebrated tumbleweed family. As they tumble about they scatter their bystander and ask that the stranger seeds and become a great source of who does not know the customs, may annoyance to the farmers. The plant, when grown, is about twenty inches high, with light green leaves and green flowers crowded together in clusters. If all the seeds that are carried about by the wind were to find favorable surroundings and grow to maturity in a surprisingly short time the earth would be overwhelmed with certain forms of plant life. It has been estimated, for instance, that a eingle frond of a certain fern turns loose to the wind four thousand million spores. Each spore floats with the slightest breeze and will produce a whole plant if conditions are favorable. These are enough to cover two million acres of land. Few cl us realize the productivity of the common mushroom. One thousand acres could be covered by the spores of one single tungue. The important part played by the veather as a means of preventing the too rapid development of the plant life of the world can be realized only when we consider the vast number of seeds produced. If conditions of the atmosphere favored a more even temperature all over the earth, as was probably the condition in the early history of the planet, there would be fewer varieties of plant life, because
