Girls in Great Britain Are Now Studying Charm As Husbands Are Scarce

FREED from war work and war worries and no longer having to fight for the vote, a considerable proportion of the feminine population of Great Britain is beginning to analyze the effects of the new independence which has come to them.

In fact, the new craze among London society women is self-study. By interesting themselves in analytical psychology these women believe they can stethoscope their own natures and discover how many personalities are lodged within themselves. After finding the best one, they thereafter submerge the other personalities, of which many women are said to have three distinct varieties. But there is a vast larger number of women more interested in arguing a woman's right to choose her own mate. This last is the burning question because more than a million girls are doomed to be husbandless here because of the shortage of men.

In one paper there is now proceeding an animated argument about the attractions of tall women and short ones. The short ones say that the tall women are not so affectionate. The tall ones reply that their seeming austerity is only a part of their general beauty.

Dr. Alfred Schofield has found a new species of women which he calls "latchkey girls," or economically independent women who will want to select their own mates.

Mrs. Belloc Lowndes, the author, says that as a Frenchwoman she believes "arranged marriages" are immensely successful and that Cupid ought to be retired in favor of fathers and mothers.

Although the seven women appointed magistrates by the Lord High Chancellor at the end of December were the first of their sex to be thus designated in Great Britain, the first woman to actually sit as a judge in a police court was Mrs. Ada Jane Summers.

Elected in 1912 as the first woman member of the Stalybridge Council, she was made Mayor of that Cheshire town last November and thus became Chief Magistrate of the police court there. As such she took her seat recently and was welcomed by a full bench of magistrates.

"I did not find it an ordeal," she told an interviewer. "I am not nervous—though I am not a speaker; the cases were trivial. I was glad they were so simple the first morning, and also," with a smile, "that I was able to let them off."

Asked if she had any decided views as to whether sentences should be severe or not, Mrs. Summers replied: "No. It depends on the case and the culprit, doesn't it? I think an old offender should be punished severely, but I do not agree with punishing children. I think the parents are to blame more often than the children. I shall be interested in those which concern women. A woman understands about a woman better than a man."

The Locomotor

An interesting problem, highly important to the future of the country, is being worked out in South Africa with the help of a new kind of railway. The problem came up with the after-the-war development of the country, the effort put forth by the Union Government to persuade the farmers to increase their crops, the willingness of the farmers to make the effort, and the impracticability of transporting the produce. The need was for more railways, but the way seemed blocked by the cost of construction, if the railways were to be operated by the regular type of locomotive. The roads are bad, and the alternation of rainy seasons with dry and windy seasons makes it a good question. And so South Africa has hit upon, and is experimenting with, a new form of railway by which the cars run on tracks and are drawn, not by the familiar locomotive but by a locomotor, whose guiding portion runs on rails like the rest of the train while its driving wheels, with solid rubber tires, travel on either side of the track. The construction of such a railway costs about $4,000 a mile, as compared with the $12,000 to $20,000 a mile cost for a standard railway in South Africa, and the system, it is said, adapts itself particularly well to the needs of a farming population. If the initial lines do as well as has been expected, South Africa will probably become a land of the locomotor.

Two Dangers.

The friend of an English clergyman, who was spending a few days in the latter's parish, says the Guardian, went up to a neighboring country one day and found an old woman just turning away from the door. "Locked and bolted," she said. She then told him that she lived in a neighboring village and that she came every now and then to the church in which she had been christened and confirmed and married, but it was always the same; she could never get in. "But what reason can she give up?" asked the friend. "I don't know, sir, I'm sure," she said. "I should think either he must be afraid of some one getting in and praying, or else he's afraid of God's getting out and seeing what a state his parish is in."

Panama Canal.

The least depth of the Panama Canal is about fifty feet. The length is about fifty miles, from deep water in the Caribbean Sea to deep water in the Pacific.

PYRAMID IN MEXICO.

It Will Rival Famous Piles of Egypt.

A pyramid that may rival those of Egypt, for size, and prove to be even older than the Nileian piles, is reported discovered at Teotihuacan, Mexico.

"Long ago two other pyramids, relics of the Toltec people of pre-Columbian times, were found among the volcanic ashes around San Juan Teotihuacan, meaning 'City of the Gods,' a village about 25 miles north-east of Mexico City," says a bulletin of the National Geographic Society of the United States.

"Excavation of the new pyramid may help to lift the veil which dims our knowledge of these American pyramid-builders, members of a by-gone race.

"Certain it is that the pyramids of Teotihuacan, which already are widely known, have kept their heads above the vomiting of angry volcanoes for numberless centuries, while it would appear that the cities nearby were without doubt buried in those bygone ages by volcanic eruptions. The Toltecs were by tradition famous mound-builders, and here it seems they mingled with their reverence for the Supreme Being the mythical religions of astral worship. Their earliest temples were devoted to the sun. The moon they worshipped as his wife and the stars as his sisters. No image was allowed within these temples, and their offerings were performed flowers and sweet-scented gums.

"The projecting stones of 'El Sol,' the highest pyramid, seen here and there over the pyramid, mark the upward progress of those indefatigable workers until they gained the summit of their ambition. The pyramid was divided into stories by placing a series of truncated pyramids one above the other.

"Two hundred and sixty-eight steps must be climbed to reach the summit. The pyramid is 216 feet in height, and has a base about 761 feet square. The summit is 59 by 105 feet square.

"Many strange idols have been dug up—Dioses of grotesque form and many others. Many beautiful pieces of jade and obsidian, arrow heads, little heads of burnt clay, earthen jars of antique form, and others similar to those in use at the present time. One little piece of cloth that was found is carefully guarded in the museum. What was its use? Many skulls, as well as some skeletons, have also been unearthed.

"Reaching the summit, one is richly rewarded, for a fine expanse of country lies unfolded to the gaze, and just a peep of the snow-capped volcano Popocatepetl far in the distance, while yonder the little town of San Juan appears sleepily dreamy under the shadow of the pyramids. Turning to the right, not far distant stands the Pyramid of the Moon (la Luna), smaller than the 'Sun Pyramid,' but looking very attractive, covered yet with its mantle of grass, heavy underbrush, and trees."

Borers That Ruin Wood.

There has been much correspondence between the American Vice-Consul at Melbourne, Australia, and the Bureau of Entomology, Department of Agriculture, over the complaint that American packing cases and other wooden goods bored by insects are arriving in Australia. The latest report on the matter is by Dr. A. D. Hopkins, Forest Entomologist, who writes:

"Evidently the damage is due to powder-post insects of one or two types or a combination of the two—either a large round-headed borer or the smaller, more numerous, and worked up into lumber and continues to work in the wood after it is finished; or Lyctus powder-post the wood of seasoned ash, hickory, oak and other hardwoods. Lyctus powder-post beetles are as a rule cosmopolitan insects, and while it is an excellent plan to prevent their introduction from the nature of the products that they attack these insects are already pretty well distributed throughout the world. Insects of this latter type are doubtless those which injured the American pick and axe handles, referred to in the Vice-Consul's report.

"Danger from the introduction of powder-post beetles in packing cases can be prevented by the use of heartwood material of ash, eliminating all sapwood, or by using yellow pine or other soft wood that these insects do not attack.

"Packing cases, boxes, etc., that are found upon arrival of shipments to be infested with insects should be burned."

Drought Broken.

Two Scots were on a journey on a hot summer day. "Hae ye any food wi' ye, McNab?" asked one. "Ou, ay, a bottle of beer. What hae ye, McAllister?"

"Dried tongue."

"Gude! Then we'll gae halves wi' oor provisions."

The beer was duly divided and drunk. McNab wiped his whiskers: "Noo for yer dry tongue, McAllister!"

"Mon," said McAllister, "it's no dry noo!"

How He Felt.

"Hae my husband appeared to miss me during the month I have been away, Mary?"

"Well, ma'am, at first he seemed in very high spirits, but toward the end of the time he became less cheerful, and yesterday, ma'am, he was just miserable."
