Montenegri
Want Scutari

THE problem that worries more than anything else the people of the former kingdom of Montenegro—now a federal province of Jug-Slavia—is that of Scutari, writes the Cetinje correspondent of the London Post.

Scutari is their "Chaba"—the Holy City on which all their eyes are set, all their desires are concentrated to-day as they have been centuries, the correspondent says. This is not a movement of the politicians, not a movement inspired from Belgrade. Indeed, people of Cetinje speak somewhat bitterly of the capital. Belgrade is far off—five or six days' journey at the least—does not realize, is but lukewarm in the matter. And they gaze down at the coveted city, in the north and mutter darkly to one another a tag from some national poet:

"While the wise were fighting each other with their wisdom, The fools were looking after their own business."

In plain words, they are itching to lay hands on Scutari, and only the presence of the Serbian troops has hitherto prevented them from doing so.

During the last few weeks demonstrations have taken place all over the country. At two of them the day in each case was market day. The peasants from the neighborhood are thronging the village square, buying, selling, chaffing, joking. Then some one drags a table from an adjacent cafe, mounts it and begins to harangue the crowd.

Speaker follows speaker; all take up the same tale. "Scutari is ours, for reasons historical, ethnological, emotional, geographical, economical. It is ours because the memories and traditions of the ages sanctify it to us. The home of our early kings, the appanage of their eldest sons. We lost it, indeed, to the Turk, but the Turk failed to make it his own. To this day its folk are our folk, or largely so; to this day, for miles around, there is not a single place-name that is not Serbian. And if we lost it we have surely brought it back again a hundred fold. One-third of our whole army died for it the other year."

These are arguments that leave Europe cold. And yet if the South Slav State is to have any sort of ease and freedom of life in the future, Scutari must either be Serbian or in the hands of those unreservedly friendly to Serbia.

The valley along which the Bojana carries the waters of Lake Scutari down to the Adriatic, a few miles distant, forms the only break in the mountain system that shuts off both Montenegro and Southern Serbia from the sea. This gap is not only the one possible outlet for Montenegro to the sea, but also the one possible outlet for the two carriageable roads that lead into the country are interesting peculiarities of engineering rather than practicable commercial routes—but it is also the natural and obvious outlet for that of the whole western interior of the Balkan Peninsula, especially the fat lands of the Metohija and Kosovo. Through it will pass, some time, a railway line which will be of great importance to the commerce of the future, the line which, down the valley of the Drin, will link Belgrade (and Sofia and Bucharest and Odessa) with the Southern Adriatic.

At the inner end of this break in the mountains, commanding it, and all transit through it, stands Scutari. It is the point which any one who wishes to transport his person or his goods into or from the interior must necessarily pass. Scutari, or the freedom of it, is as essential to Montenegro as the south of Serbia as a Flume is to Croatia and the north.

But this is not all. The Drin has of recent years cut for itself a new channel, entering the Bojana just below Scutari, and now keeps the latter river choked with the silt it washes down. The consequences are not only that the navigation of the Bojana is rendered impossible for the larger sort of craft, but that the waters of the lake have been raised vastly beyond their earlier level.

The change is welcome by fishermen about Scutari, but it has been a disaster to Montenegro. Year by year the lake has crept further up the rich soil wealth, until now thousands on thousands of hectares lie beneath its waters. Another result is that all these districts are now infested with malaria; the encroaching waters largely dry up in summer, leaving great stretches of marsh for mosquitoes to breed in.

Serbian official policy is that if the powers set up a really independent Albania, then to such an Albania—with which it would be possible to have close relations, including perhaps a military and certainly an economic convention—might Scutari safely be handed over. But Montenegro frankly doubts the possibility of such an Albania, and the will of the powers to create it. And she is afraid—afraid for her ten thousand graves, for her unborn children. And if, she says, the sacred principle of the self-determination of nationalities is to be invoked she has a good right to invoke it as anyone else.

Praise!
Little Gerald was visibly perturbed. "Daddy," he asked, "what does a fellow mean when he says you're a 'hot sketch'?" "Daddy was almost equal to the occasion. 'He simply means you're a warm baby, son,' he explained.
