British Legion and Its Work
Immediately, and for some time, after the armistice, employers of labor, companies, firms, individuals, allied to the appeal to find places for veterans, to make a preferred list for them. There is a different story now. It has become necessary to stimulate the emotion of gratitude, "not we forget." Capt. Cyril Falls, late of the General Staff, who writes about the British Legion in the Nineteenth Century, finds the cooling of gratitude human, and therefore to be expected:
"We cannot burn forever with the fever of victory. This our world, if it would continue to exist, must settle to its mundane tasks, must fix its vision on the future rather than the past, must strive to renew itself in peace after having almost destroyed itself in war."
There are more than 1,300 branches or posts of the British Legion, and it has a membership running into the millions. It con- cerns itself for the present mainly with unemployment. Although it be- gan its work as short a time ago as July, between 150,000 and 200,000 men have received temporary relief. It has obtained from the Govern- ment a promise that in public works for the benefit of the unem- ployed 75 per cent of the places or jobs shall be given to ex-service men. The British Legion keeps in touch with consuls abroad to find land and work for veterans, says the New York Times. Arrangements are making to bring them to Britain, Columbia and Australia, where em- grants will be welcome. King George takes an active interest in the cam- paign of the Legion. Employers who are willing to make a prefer- ence for members have their names subscribed upon the King's Roll and are allowed to use a special seal in their business. There is not a company or firm in Great Britain that is not periodically addressed by the Legion in the interests of the veterans. Will the business men of England employ 5, 10, 20 per cent. of soldiers and sailors who can prove their competence? Assents come in by the thousand. One firm writes that it employs 75 per cent. of ex-service men and hopes to in- crease it.
It is sometimes forgotten that a great many of the soldiers who fought so bravely and endured the privations of trench and field were not bread earners, had learned no trade, nor qualified for business or a profession when they went to the war; others were just beginning to fit themselves into the social and industrial organization, and had not acquired the skills they were indispen- sable. Fortunate were their fellows older in years and riper in experience, for in many cases they returned to the work they had dropped. They had no difficulty in placing themselves. The inexperienced came back to a world of unemployment, disorganized, that could not always find room for them in the shop and factory and on the farm, even with the best of intentions. Three years of hard times followed, in which profits were down during the war, divid- ed, and sometimes disappeared. Not infrequently an employer kept the pay envelope circulating when he could not afford to do it. There was sometimes a reason for what was sometimes an insensibility to the claims of returned soldiers. The fact remains that in England, as in this country, gratitude for what they had done and suffered came to be more of a memory in the individual than an inspiration to helpfulness.
While the Legion is not in politics, it knows what members of Parliament and leaders of party opinion are well disposed, and candidates elected to Parliament are constantly reminded of their pledges to do something for the veterans.
Capt. Falls says that the man who joins the Legion "is helping himself, but he is also helping England," for "the case of England to-day is in many respects as desperate as it was under the menace of the submarine campaign." The success of the or- ganization owes much to the sym- pathy and encouragement of Lord Haig. He thinks it has a great part to play in the future of the nation.
"The ultimate goal of the British Leg- ion," he says, "must be an uplifting of the whole people and the creat- ing of a happier and more God- fearing community."
Lord Haig soon saw that the soldiers' organization were working at cross-purposes and not making much headway in securing relief for their members. He suggested a plan to include the officers, and the British Legion was born. It is democra- tic, non-sectarian, without political connections of any kind. Among its principles are these: Perpetuation of the ideals for which the British soldier and sailor fought, the safe- guarding of justice, freedom and democracy, the sanctifying "of our comradeship by devotion to mutual service and helpfulness."
A Strong Man.
Elmer G. Bitgood, of Vernon, Conn., offers to hold a greater weight at gun's length—215 pounds—than any other man in the world. He holds 150 pounds at arm's length with one finger, lifts 2,600 pounds clear of the ground and walks with 1,500 pounds. He refuses all mu- seum and circus offers.
Once Was Enough.
She loved scandal and gossip. She leaned over towards her young boy- friend. "Tell me," she said, "did you ever catch your husband flirting?"
"Yes, once," answered the young woman. The woman's eyes widened with interest. "What did you do?" she asked. "Married him."
