I have always noticely that reople who move about the world much, people who travel who feel their minds upon new, fresh impressions and new experiences, have more vitality than those who remain choistered at home. They are fresher. their minds are more alert; they are more buoyant physically and mentally, more cheerful, hopeful. more alive, because their minds are better nourished they are growing, while the others get into a rut and stag-

Monotony is fatal to growth. People who live secluded, monotonous lives, become such slaves of habit that after a witte they don't want to make any change in their daily routine. They cannot bear to go away from their homes, to leave their own beds, their own firesides, their home comforts. They are rooted in one place; their lives are rutty, their minds become rutty, stale. They are dull and stagnant like a pool of water that
