AERIAL PHOTOS TRACE OLD ROMAN SITES

When the photos were submitted to Mr. Crawford he was soon able to GUARD BARY'S HEALTH identify the mysterious markings on them as ancient British "lynchets," or field boundaries, which were formed during the Roman occupation of Britain and perhaps some centuries before. The Celtic system, as revealed by the airplane photos, was a network of small patches, rarely more than two to three acres in size. In many cases there could be seen upon the same section nearby mounds and hollows of tile river valleys, which they cleared. When the Saxon invaders arrived they destroyed the upland Celtic villages, and when they settled down founded new villages along the line of the fertile river vallayes, which they cleared, introducing from Germany a system of strip cultivation radically different from the older British system.

Ancient Ramparts Shown. The airplane photos depicted pre-Roman hilltop camps actually in a new light, disclosing features which were wholly invisible from the ground. Within two camps photographed they revealed a faint inner ring within the outer ramparts, which appears unconnected with the rest, and older. Mr. Crawford wonders whether the vestiges of neolithic works were not ancient when the outer camps made. Little or nothing is present of the pre-broads

Now there is some prospect that the airplane may help solve the problems connected with the earliest inhabitants of Britain. It is conceded that the science of air photography for archaeological purposes is still in its infancy, but the results so far obtained are regarded as most encouraging. The factor, as 6,000 feet gave good average results.
