BE ASHAMED TO BE SICK

The woman of to-day, instead of being proud of her illness, is beginning to be ashamed to be sick. Sickness is an admission of inefficiency. It is an admission that one has been a bad manager in the business of living.

The principal topics of conversation among women, and men, too, for that matter, have been the number of operations and "what the doctor said." Instead, the conversation should be on the number of miles one can walk without tiring and the record months er years of unbroken good health.

An unbroken record of good health foes not necessarily mean the absence of a doctor in the house: that is a proud remark frequently heard. The absence of a physician in the home does not necessarily indicate that his services were not needed. The best essurance of good health requires the regular co-operation of the family with the physician to the end that medical science may be brought to bear on the problems of the family bealth and welfare.

The work of the physician is changing and the new attitude of thep ublic toward disease and health. The doctor will probably have more instead
