THE WAY OF THE BROTHERHOOD

He was a brilliant rooster, but his conversation was not so brilliant. It was a noisy affair in volume to that of a bird half a dozen times his size, a noise moreover, of a peculiarly irritating quality. The Gulicks had never lived next door to a rooster before, and the experience was no disagreeable that gradually, although unconsciously, they came to include the bird's owners as well as the bird in their feeling of hostility.

"We really must go in and call," Mrs. Gulick would sigh. "It is disgraceful not to when they are next-door neighbors, and strangers here at that."

"I suppose we must," Evelyn would answer, with a responsive sigh, "but I do dread it. What can we have in common with a family that keeps a rooster like that?"

So six weeks slipped by, and the Gulicks had not called, and on the seventh they no longer thought of calling on anyone, for Emily was ill. It began with a severe attack of the grippe that left her alarmingly weak. While she was delicious she had not noticed the rooster, but in the exhaustion that followed, his shrill and constant crowing tortured her more and more. Finally Mrs. Gulick and Evelyn decided that they must do something.

"I don't know what they will think of us," Mrs. Gulick said, "when we've never called, but I write the nicest note I know how."

"It is a difficult situation," Evelyn returned whimsically. "We might offer to board out the rooster till Emily gets well! Really, you don't know how to approach people like that."

The note was written, however, and the Gulicks waited anxiously. All day there was no reply—but the rooster did not crow. The Gulicks were uneasy; they did not want to offend a surprise. It came over at five o'clock by the hands of a trim little maid. It was a silver tray with a bowl of bouillon, and a note that ran:

Dear Mrs. Gulick;
We are so very sorry that Hannibal should have annoyed your daughter; if we had known that anyone was ill, we should have silenced him before this—indeed, we had spoken of doing so, but Bobbie pleaded for his life. I hope it does not argue ill for the strength of Bobbie's affections that he has decided that, after all, roller-skates will contribute more to the joy of life than Hannibal.

Will Miss Emily be good enough to accept her fallen foe in this form?
With best wishes for her swift recovery,

Very cordially yours,
Mary A. Stedman.

Above the note Mrs. Gulick's eyes and her daughter's met. "Tomorrow we call on the Stedmans," Evelyn declared.

CONDIGN PUNISHMENT

The late Frederick Remington had a personality as original and vivacious as his artistic style. His friends have scores of amusing anecdotes to tell of him. It was E. W. Kemble who introduced me to Frederick Remington in 1890, writes Mr. Augustus Tomas in the Century Magazine. The two illustrators were close friends, and they understood one another perfectly.

They sat together one night on a late train, out of New York. Remington by the car window and Kemble next to the aisle. An obstreperous commuter who had been drinking was shouting the praises of his own. Nothing was said, but the man's face turned red with indignation. The next passenger looked at him. The words were in his mouth.

As he passed Kemble's side on his next instant passed through the car. Remington reached out into the aisle and with a mighty grip, lifted him down his feet like a naughty boy, and laid him face downward over Kemble's lap. Then, as Remington held the ruffian fast, Kemble opened his eyes, while the man's legs wriggled frantically for a foothold. The commotion, prolonged and vigorous, was occasioned by roars of laughter from the other passengers. When it was over, Remington stood the offender on his feet. The man began a profane tirade. Before he had got half a dozen words out, Remington had him face down again, and Kemble was at work as before. That was enough, and when they let the fellow go he rapidly disappeared in another car.
