HOW THE RUIN IS BEING PAID FOR

Germany Shirks Her Debts.

The chart shows why France is so enraged over the failure of Germany to meet the obligations set by the Treaty of Versailles. Of damages caused by the war, totalling 102 billions of francs, Germany in five years has made restitution of only 4 billions of francs, or about 760,000,000 in normal exchange.

Afraid to Live.

"One does not fall," says the cat in Rudy in Hans Andersen's story of the "Ice Maiden." "If one is not afraid to climb." Some of us are but half alive, or nearer to death than to life, because we are afraid of what may happen if we go mountaineering or venture out into the open or desert the chart of the familiar for experience altogether new. We look about us and we think we see many for whom there is no serious problem to solve. It looks as though Fate had dealt gently with them and hardly with us. They cannot know what trouble we have where the going is so smooth for them. But it is easy to be fooled. The worst of this world whom we see and think we know are likely to have come through a storm of adversity to the peace that now reigns in their souls, the calm of a life victorious.

Life, like the natural law, plays no favorites. We must obey the rules; if we run afoul of them, we have to take the consequences. With spirits depleted—in that mood which we call "low in the mind"—obstacles bristle and abound. We cannot see the way for the lions that roar and are prepared to leap on us and rend us. We cast about for excuses to postpone any action. We look for shelter. We dread even the ordinary appointments of the working day or the social round. We deplore the necessity for making decisions and wish that others would command and lead.

That is a moral cowardice, which generally has a physical basis. If we feel "well," we feel equal to anything. We may tell ourselves that Emily Dickinson that we are adequate, that we will choose or be rejected. And I choose—just a throne. But if we grow disheartened, then the bogeys come. Fears, little and large, pluck at our morale and tend to destroy our nerve. What once we laughed away now has power to appall us. We know that the state is morbid; we seem to lack the strength of will to dismiss it. But we are our own best doctors always; and the best tonic is in that inner cabinet of one's own resolute and cheerful mind.

If we are afraid to live, we spread the doubt and consternation, as the fear in the heart of one soldier, if he expresses it in act, affects the marching ranks. If, on the other hand, we are bold "to banish querulous doubts" and to grapple with our trivial or considerable duties, others will take heart to do likewise. None lives to himself alone; every victory creates more victors; every sum of gains increases the number of those who pull down the flag and admit defeat.
