CHAPTER V .- (Cont'd) The Chinaman seated himself where Culver had been, and repeated the same finger movements. This time the result was a slight click, and Culver's mystified gase saw the top of the table fly back, disclosing what appeared to be the inside of a large level case. But instead of the delicate tints on which jewels usually rest, the inside of this was padded with black satin, and on its centre, in rather singular contrast, rested a box of green jade about five inches square. Tung Yung touched another spring and the square of glass protecting the box slid back like a panel, leaving just enough space for it to be lifted out. He then took from another drawer in the table a small glass jar with a perforated top, from which he dusted his hands with hands with a more drawer with a perforated top, from which he dusted his hands with a serious described in their breast and wonder if he was not destined to head up the torch for the Old World, the pagan world of China.
