REMEMBER THE LIVING DEAD

It is well that we should do honor to those who gave their lives for their country. The memory of their heroic sacrifices persists in the hearts of all of us at all times; but it is well to set apart one day for special service and outward consecration.

It is well also, that we should remember those who have not given their lives, but their health, their prosperity, their success, pretty much all that makes life in this world profitable and attractive. There are those who are indeed moving about us, but who are maimed, crippled or otherwise injured and who perform the offices of daily life with a steadfast courage only the greater for their manifest incapacity. Yet, Heaven forgive us! we sometimes lose our patience with them. There are those whom we never see and are too likely to forget, who are so thoroughly disabled, physically or mentally that they can never again take any active part with their fellows and even in some terrible cases are so disfigured that their fellows can hardly endure the sight of them at all. And we know that these latter are in a manner taken care of. The government, for which they sacrificed everything, provided physicians and nurses to do what is necessary, and what is necessary is done. But physicians and nurses are human; they have their own lives to live, and the care of a helpless, hopeless burden is too likely to be mechanical, and in times of hurry and fatigue there may be indifference, perhaps even neglect. And you say, what can I do about it? Alas! alas! too little. But you can at least pay your taxes with more conscience and less reluctance when you reflect that a part of them goes to provide for those who have given everything for you. When it becomes a question of giving directly for the relief or the entertainment of the disabled men in the hospitals you can drain your resources for a little more than they will stand. And you can all the time help to keep public sentiment alive in the matter, since, more than anything else, public sentiment will insure care and attention on the part of those whose business it is to provide for them.

Not long ago the Prince of Wales visited a war hospital where there were thirty hopeless cases. He was introduced to twenty of them and talked with them. "Where are the other ten?" he asked. He was told that they were too badly injured for him to see, but he insisted and finally saw nine of them. He found it shocking and distressing enough, yet here again he was cordial and kindly. "But," he said, "there is still one more." "Impossible Your Royal Highness. No one is allowed to see the poor fellow but the necessary doctors and nurses." "I am here to see them all," said the prince, "and I will see them all." The attendants gave way, and the last room was opened. For an instant the prince turned pale and shook with the agonized pity of the spectacle. Then summoning all his energy he walked gently across the room and kissed the dreadful relic of a human face. In that moment he was more than a prince, more than a king; he was a young, normal, healthy man, with a life and a future before him, and that future will carry the shadow of a haunting, unforgettable, salutary horror.

We do not wish to impose unnecessary horror upon ourselves or our children. But we may at least make the effort to remember with sacred grief and sympathy those who gave far more than life, gave a busy, useful, hopeful, happy, young humanity, that their country might be saved.

THE JOKE WAS ON PUCCINI

There are ingenious and quick-witted newspaper reporters in other lands than ours—even in Italy, where, perhaps, we should not much expect to find them. Once when Puccini, the Italian composer, was visiting in Milan, he attended a performance of his opera, "Tosca," in order to study the effect of certain parts of the production upon the audience. The master entered the house unknown, bought a seat in the pit, and was greatly pleased with the display of enthusiasm over his opera.

At the end of the opera, he writes in a German paper, the enthusiasm increased to a delirium; a young lady who was sitting next to me became highly incensed because I did not also join in the applause; and with a stare and an insolent toss of her head, she said: "Why don't you applaud the masterpiece?"

"Masterpiece!" said I, and laughed scornfully. "Don't you believe it?"

"Why, don't you like music?"

"No," I said. "It is an uninteresting work."

"You do not understand much about music, I take it," remarked my neighbor.

"That was enough. I began to tell her how, according to the rules of thorough tags and counterpoint, the opera of "Tosca" was a very poor production. I showed her how a certain aria reminded the hearer of Verdi, and a chorus of Binet. In fact, I left nothing unsaid regarding the whole opera. When I had finished, my neighbor inquired:

"Is that your honest opinion, really and truly?"

"Absolutely."

"Well, I don't know," she said doubtfully, and disappeared in the crowd.

The next morning I came down to breakfast intending to read my newspaper in peace; but the first thing that confronted me was a headline in heavy type—Puccini Criticizes His "Tosca." And there I read in black and white all the sharp things that I had said the previous evening. The young woman was a musical reporter. She had recognized me, and had led me on to criticize the whole opera, without my having the slightest suspicion of her connection with the press!

Loosened Up, All the Same

"Robert, have you any loose change?"

"No, dear, money's too tight."
