This is the very simple fashion now prevalent of using a colored valance way across the top, and net voile, or marquisette underneath. Both the edge of the valance and the inside and bottom edge of the net or voile have tatting or a similar edge for finish. It is tied back with the same material as the valance.

In this treatment you get color and something kicky and interesting; yet you are not troubled by too much drapery crowding the already limited space. I have seen this simple expedient make a little up stairs bedroom all over-with, of course, the addition of proper wall color and brightly bainted woodwork.

A valance plays little tricks with our eyes and some windows should never be introduced to it. Others need a valance badly in order to correct their proportions and make the window look either shorter or taller. The height of the window, in relation to its width and the height of the wall, determines the depth of the valance.

Ordinarile an eight-inch depth is quite safe. If the window is short, then shorten the valance or else eliminate it entirely. If the window is very high deepen the valance. Pin up a piece of paper if you are in 4
