Then he went into the corral. The first horse he touched whinnied and rubbed his nozz'e against his arm. Callahan felt along the neck. It was meist. Then he ran his hand down to the withers. They too were wet. Putting his hand to his nose, he exclaimed, "Perspiration! This is the horse all right, but who was the rider?"

And he looked long and thoughtfully at the end of the ranch house where Chuck Jones slept.

His mind was made up. The next day, bright and early, Callahan presented himself at the Post in Calgary. He did not tell the Sergeant his suspicions exactly, but he searched with care the file of fugi-tives from justice. Finally he found the paper he was looking for. When he had read it over twice, he told the other officers of his adventure at the Bar-O ranch and of the boobish looking peeler of spuds. He described his appearance and his bland, boyish countenance. 'That's Malloy's description all right. But there are only two people who can identify Malloy, and Harkness is up Peace River."

A roomy three-cornered manyshelved cupboard in a narrow hall was converted into a hall-wardrobe by the removal of all shelves with the exception of the top one, which formed a convenient place for gloves, clothesbrushes and hats. On the underside of the remaining shelf a brass rod for coat hangers was hung. After these fitments had been installed, there was still space in the curboard to hold umbrellas and walking sticks.
