Sifted Sunlight.

Softly the sunlight sifts through the green leaves, leaving but a pailed yellow dust on moist lichen, or a tiny nugget of flat gold scattered carelessly shout the mottled floor in the vaulted stiliness of the petit forest, preserved on an evergreen peninsula that is like s green medallion imposed on the waters of Lake Washington.

There are mingling scents of pine, of fir, of cedar, or wank, moist-laden earth where the sun has been so finely sifted by the leaves as scarcely to senetrate at all; to be dissipated in places by the closely woven screen of the leafy sieve, to become intangible, invisible; yet entirely palpable at noon. of a clear day, when the forest is more green than dark, with an immutable, eternal greenness.

The lilting fragrance of the earth that delights the senses is the frankincense and myrrh of a Northwestern forest, the fine flower of a summer day amid vast trees that stretch tall spindly summits from thick brownish columns towards the fleeting clouds. There is scarcely a bloom, merely leaves, of every shape and style, yet the air is redolent of earthy scents, of fingering treasure of faint wood perfume unrepressed and undistilled.

Green leaves are fluttering on the frees; brown leaf mould and the fila. gree of leaves, lacy outlines, are on the ground. Little pools of sun: little ponds of shadow.

Everywhere beyond the swirling breeze that scampers the ripples along the heach and the wayward leaves of the short, there is a majestic stillness. the silence of growing trees under a
