Little House.

The transparent April twilight was fust drifting into dusk when Nick came to lean once more against the little picket fence. Magic was in the air. It had been hard at word in the neglected garden, pulling the weeds, stirring the brown earth, setting out rows and clumps of sturdy, thrifty green plants. It had even bewitched some of them into flowering; he could see the jeweled pink of minute daistes and the lifted faces of the pansies, beguiling as small children. It had shined the brass knocker on the door and lighted candles between frilled muslin curtains and swelled lilac buds to fat. jade buttons and tempered the remote chill of the air to something soft and sweet and strange; it had unlatched the gate and let spring into Reddy's garden. And now it opened the green door and let Reddy out. . . Reddy motioned him into the long, low room that was living-room and dining-room and library, and better than her dreams, . He leaned back contentedly in the great winged chair, so serenely gay in its faded Portuguese chintz, watching Reddy's light hands choose exactly the right cup and saucer from the assortment that filled the dim green cupboard like a great nosegay. What an incredibly ni e room! Every thing in it was so absolutely rightthe shapeless friendliness of the huge sofa, the tidiness of the little fat barrel chairs, the faded silver of the. paper on the walls, the wavering light which were generously doing their caught in the tarnished mirrorsduty as pictures, too, with their careful studies of little churches under green willows, little boats on blue waves, little gentlemen and ladies saying farewell forever in long-lost
