Going On.

We live in a world that is going on. Our language is full of words which mean rest and pause and stop, but they are all outlawed by fuller information. Science has reached its most bewildering and appalling concept in the idea of motion-everything on the move. Sun and moon and stars, all sweeping on with majestic stride, the earth revolving on its axis, swinging in its yearly orbit around the sun, and with the great solar family of which it is but an inconspicuous member proceeding forever in some still farther trek across the boundless fields of space.

Turning from the astronomic fmmensities, the microscope has examined the molecule, the atom, the electron; and they all speak the same language-going on. Life is motion, and the guess is now abroad that motion is life. At all events, things which once seemed to be solid and stertle and dead are now known to be vividly and actively astir; the rock and the ore of steel and the huge bulk of the mountain-all resolve themseives into motions of incredible veloce ities. In the long view, the hills are as fluid as the waves of the sea.

And the mystery of it and the wonder is that while all the multitude of things singly and individually appear to have their beginnings and their ends, the whole, of which they are the perishing ingredients, remains. The soldiers drop out one by one, but the army marches on; the trees fade and fall, but the forest continues; nations, empires, generations tread upon each other's heels and vanish, but the human race goes on. So great, indeed, so vast, so incredibly magnificent, is this awful succession and continuance of the far-spread universe of things and forces, that the mind of man quails before it and can form no adequate conception of it.

And here appears another mystery: For us humans the way of health and strength and all the fidelities seems faiter, to stop, to fall into futile doubts selves call every such hesitation and fashioning. Earth's Hard Heart.

According to a scientist, Dr. E. D. Williamson, who has just concluded a series of exhaustive investigations into the subject, the Earth is built on a principle similar to that of the oldfashioned metal-cored golf bail, with the addition of several layers of a lighter substance and a very thin surface crust.

The metal core of the Earth, according to this authority, is pure iron, or an alloy of iron and nickel, having a thickness of not less than 4,200 miles. The distance from the outer edge of this core to the surface is about 1.750 miles; this is divided into three layers. Next to the core itself is a mixture of fron and rock, extending to within 800 miles of the Earth's crust. On top of this is a layer of rock similar to that scattered about the surface, but containing a much larger proportion of Askalon was a scaport of the Philis-

This new knowledge of the Earth's formation has been obtained mainly through studying the velocity of earthquake waves as they pass through the earth, as well as by an investigation of the contents of meteorites, with are generally accepted as being milar in composition to that of the earth.
