IN THE EARLY PIONEER DAYS OF CANADA

A Sketch of the Life of Major General Sir Isaac Brock
By Colman Edwin

(Continued from Last Issue) Americans today assert, supported by Jefferson's own letters, that at least so long as he was in office he had done all in his power to restrain the "torrent of passions that was directed towards war and to bring in another empire than that of Arms, I.e., that of embargo, that he had been firm and sincere in warding off war as long as possible—only desiring that if it must come, it should be when England had a Bonapart upon her hands. But Canadians at that time did not see it exactly in this light. As far back as 1808 until 1812 the American Government had been scheming to provoke, which appeared to Canada a wanton and rapacious invasion of an offending country, at a time when their natural protector was crippled in her power to them by hostilities at home.

When the declaration of war by Congress, war really placed beyond doubt, it seemed to them the climax of a long continued policy especially marked in President Madison, designed to aggravate hostile feelings and excite the popular mind to a point of invasion it is to be wondered at, that those who had to bear the brunt and engage in war without having done anything to provoke it who saw their peaceful homes exposed to be ravaged by a foe close at hand should at times have found it impossible to repress the tide of indignation and bitter words.

Note—It should not be forgotten that the war was brought on by a predominate party—the slave holding states and western, in Congress being 79 to 49 against it in the east and northern states.

General Brock had true friends in Canada, not only from Merrie England, Bonnie Scotland, the Emerald Isle, but from true Canadian hearts who had not forgotten England's kindness and the unjust treatment of the Americans. The French, too sent men and money to them in the time of need. It was while spending an evening at one of these homes they saw an officer, another with him, come galloping up to the house as if with hasty news. They wished to speak to the General (one was Colonel McDonald, General Brock's Aid de Camp). He arose at once and left the room. Silence crept over the party during his absence, no one seemed able to open up a subject as all minds felt it was a message concerning war. At General Brock's return to the room, his face was pale with a thoughtful expression and he stood for a moment silent. When he spoke his voice betrayed how deeply he felt the tidings he had to tell. "I have just received private intelligence from Washington; war was declared on the 18th." This was some days later in the month of June, 1812. His cup was full shortly before this having received word from home, a London bank had failed in which he and his family had placed their united wealth. This loss was over 75,000 lbs. He had assigned his entire salary to meet the needs of his brothers and sisters. He had written a letter saying if necessary he would sell his possessions and they could still be happy in another corner of the Isle, he slept little, he worried over their cases at home. "Could tears restore us—we would be happy, may you be happy." He spoke of the sincere nature of courageous folks he met in Canada, of the kindness and stirring character in the men and women but his letters told plainly his longings for home.

Whatever the spirits of the people of Canada, they were in desperate straits. Play and pleasure were laid aside every man became a volunteer. Despite the hardships a spirit of loyalty was manifest. Every clearance became a drill hall. The volunteers proved worthy to march with the regulars. In the towns, villages and sparsely populated townships, staunch Canadians rose as a man, determined at all hazards to stand by the old flag and go forth under the venerated ensign to fight to the death for King and Country. From all quarters the military offered their immediate service and bands of willing volunteers poured into York (Toronto), Newark (Niagara) and Kingston, eager to bear arms.

General Brock had speedily issued all the arms at his disposal, barely sufficient to arm the militia required to guard the frontier. plowshares, knives, pruning hooks were all made articles of destruction. Many poor, brave colonists who had left their fields were sadly destitute of clothing. Many were without shoes, which at that time were very scarce. Still, their heroism was such as to drill without them. This exposure and privation was enough to try their endurance, still they cheerfully rendered service as a Canadian volunteer.

On the 12th of July General Hull invaded Canada. He issued a proclamation, alluding to the tyranny of Great Britain, he promised them that should they make no resistance to emancipate them from tyranny and oppression and restore them to dignified station as freemen. He declared however that if resistance were offered and the Indians were allowed to participate in that resistance, no quarters would be given them, but war would become a war of extermination. He placed the following terms before them: The United States offer you peace, liberty, and security. Your choice lies in between these and war, slavery and destruction. This was a tremendous bribe. They were offered peace, comfort, security, undisturbed possession of all that made up their outward life the price being only the sacrifice of their conscientious convictions of honor, loyalty and duty. And they who then resisted the first of these alternatives knew well that a most serious crisis was impending—that they were entering on a contest which might be long, bloody and destructive and whose success was at best extremely doubtful. IN MEMORIAM

DOUGHERTY—In loving memory of our dear wife and mother, Isabella Dougherty, who died a year ago today, July 8, 1926; aged 72 years.

A mother's love's a blessing,
Treat not that love with scorn;
Cherish her whilst living,
You'll miss her when she's gone.
There's someone who misses you sadly
But tries to be brave and content;
So we shed a tear that is silent
And breathe a sigh of regret.
For YOU were ours to remember,
If all the world forget.
Sadly missed by
Husband and Family.
