IN THE EARLY PRINCE DAYS OF CANADA
ful. Even in these days they had a strong belief in their creator, the travelling clergy had met here and there, best to get the people together. Strong was the belief in the Al-mighty to save, and the Quakers that do not take part in warfare would not shrink, but many a bronzed Yeoman shouldered his rusty old fire-lock that had descended from some of their ancestors as an heirloom, and as after the clinging farewells of wife and children, he turned his back on his rude but comfortable home-stead the familiar field he had clear-ed and tilled, the animals he had cared for with their patient, well known faces looking at him as he passed, felt a strange choking in his throat and a tear dimming his eye, he would turn again for another look at the home he knew he might never see again.

General Brock, in the meantime was busy physically and mentally laboring to provide for the protection of the long exposed frontier of 1300 miles in the upper Canada, a little more than the same number of regu-lars, soldiers exclusive of garrisons. It was clear enough that without the substantial and ready aid of Canadian volunteers the British force could not long have maintained the unequal contest; and without the rallying point of its brave resolute, hopeful, foreseeing and prompt General and Governor, the country itself might have sunk into a demoralizing de-pendency. But General Brock fore-saw and provided for every exigency, giving confidence to the anxious and sometimes drooping spirits of the people and encouraged and cheered them on their staunch and effective defence.

General Brock's answer to the pro-clamation by General Hull was that "the Crown of England would de-fend and avenge all its subjects whether red or white;" "that Cana-da knew her duty to herself and to her sovereign and was neither to be bullied nor cajoled into a departure from it."

On the 27th of July General Brock convened at York an extra session of legislature of upper Canada. At first considerable dependency was per-ceptible in the counsels and the speeches of those who had met for deliberation at so momentous a crisis, but the energy and ascendancy of Brock's animating spirit joined by outbursts of loyalty among the people, rallied their spirits.

FERTILIZERS FOR FALL WHEAT
HUNDREDS of Ontario farmers now realize that a complete fertilizer such as our Scot-tish "Special" 3-10-5 yields the most profitable re-sults on fall wheat.

In certain quarters the use of Acid Phosphate is recommended, but this article being a raw ma-terial and liable to contain free Sulphuric Acid, which destroys lime in the soil and retards bac-terial development, is too risky to use.

Is it not significant that in the older fertilizer using sections of the United States, farmers are now so prejudiced against Acid Phosphate that manufacturers in that territory are presently con-sidering changing the name of the article?

Write us for a copy of our new pamphlet "FERTILIZERS FOR FALL WHEAT" just published, giving further information.
