RECORD VS. RECOLLECTION

Not infrequently an "old timer" is heard to remark that the weather is different from what it was when he was young. One such will contend that our climate is undergoing a change, that the winters are diminishing in severity and the proof is offered by reverting to a big snow "when I was a boy." The weather bureau has more than once felt it necessary to combat the idea of the change of climate by referring to the records which go back quite a way now, but often not so far as the "old timer's" recollection. However, official records, as far as they reach, are more dependable.

The bureau has dug up snow records to prove that we are just as likely now to have a heavy snowfall as ever. There is no regularity about such things. Nor are snows distributed evenly. In the U. S. the greatest snowfall on record occurred at Springfield, Ill., 14 years ago the coming winter. It was 43 inches and the people there would seem to be pardonable if ever afterward they refer to it as "the big snow." The greatest seasonal snowfall was in Boston, in 1873-74, but the winter with the least snow was but two years later.

It is human frailty to exaggerate events of the past.

In our early youth we are more deeply impressed by occurrences and in reverting to them in later years they take on a magnified form. The contrast of the legs of a boy from those of a man as a measure of snowfall has force. We may measure temperature by the way it affects us individually and not by the register in the thermometer. In those excessively cold winters of the past probably there were few accurate thermometers. Even now these gauges vary greatly in the readings where there are exceptional temperatures.

The life of one person is too short a period for any marked change to be noted. There is variance from year to year, but it is probably but a repetition of what has been re-enacted for generations.

HOG-KILLING TIME

Notice that smoke rising over behind the farm house? Hear that porker squeal? Hog-killing time is here. Like laws of the Medes and Persians that change not, the proper time for butchering varies not at all. Each day now at some farm kettles are set down from the garret, inspected and cleaned, ladies gathered together, knives sharpened and everything made ready. Then the next day butchering is on with an early start. Early, because there is more to be done than can be accomplished in one day, and also because one of the time-honored customs of butchering day is to get hogs on the skewers early.

But the meals at butchering time—whole juicy tenderloins, pork chops, all the pies and cakes, dried corn, beans, pickles, mashed potatoes' preserves made from strawberries gathered over on the hill last spring, jellies from the currants and raspberries up in the patch, canned fruits from those trees out in the orchard, home-made bread, fresh and crackly—all you can eat of whatever you can think of for dinner; and then at supper the same menu again, with plenty of fresh sausage, seasoned with coriander and spices, in addition to the dinner's offerings.

And, when all is finished, the larder is filled again for cold days with food that the city dweller covets and can not buy. And it's a fine thing to know that come weel, come woe, there is meat enough in the brine, or larder or smokehouse to keep the wolf from the door another year.
