Sacrifice

A life lived without sacrifice is a life of non-productiveness. From the earliest ages of life, sacrifice has been the secret door by which we may enter into a larger and a greater life.

In the beginning of life there must first be sacrifice. In the plant life we behold the kernel of grain, perfect in itself, and containing therein the germ of life. To develop this germ of life it is necessary that this kernel of grain sacrifice itself. When it is planted in the earth the germ of life starts to grow while the substance of the kernel passes in sacrifice to the nourishment of the new life sprouting forth. We might take note of the sacrifice made by the salmon in the Frazer River. In the spring of the year you can see the great fish leaping up-stream seeking for the clearer waters near its source where they lay their spawn which contains the germ of life that will produce hundreds of fish. The great salmon have been known to jump ten to fifteen feet up over a water fall to reach the source of a river. Many of the weaker ones will kill themselves on the rocks in their efforts—in sacrifice. For what? To produce life. Those who reach their goal, after they have laid their spawn, die. Why? No one can tell, but it is a true picture of sacrifice. We can find this true in animal life as well. The animal that is dumb, and a slave to humanity, can teach us much about sacrifice.

The human sacrifice brings us into a larger world and the realm of true sacrifice. Mother—who is always making sacrifices for her children. Spending sleepless nights as she watches by the bedside of her sick child. Mother, who works early and late and whose work is never done, yet she is never too tired to do some little kindness that will make some one happy. How many are there, who in their childhood days ever thought their mother sacrificed herself for them? But as you grew into years of maturity, it very suddenly came to your mind all the things that your mother did, and how she must have sacrificed her comfort for you, so you might enjoy life untroubled.

Why is mother so content—it is because of the sacrifice she made for her children, her loved ones. Sitting by the bedside of my own dear Mother last week, as she lay close to Death's door. She very quietly and serenely said, "I know my time has come, and I am ready to go." She is still with us, and amid her great suffering there abides in her heart the joy of sacrifice, joy for all she has done for her children.

The Great Teacher, Christ, said, "Greater Love hath no man than this that he lay down his life for his friend." To me, my Mother has shown the "Greater Love" in the great life of sacrifice that she has lived for her children.

What is our great sacrifice to-day? Are we making any for our loved ones? Or are we doing things that hurt the hearts of those that love us? Let us be honest with ourselves and with God and make the supreme sacrifice of "Mother Love" and live and do for others. May we all so live that when our time comes, we shall hear our Maker say, "Well done, thou hast lived a life of Sacrifice, enter into the joy of Eternal Life."

The death of Conan Doyle removes one of the most interesting figures of the literary world. He will be remembered as the creator of Sherlock Holmes and as a leader in psychical research.

People that are continually seeking the easiest way through life are strangers to the act of sacrifice. Their life has but one production, selfishness, the end of such a life is loneliness and misery—but a life filled with sacrifice, is a life of Greater Love; it is a life of priceless value, whose home is Heaven above.
