OCTOBER

In this month summer seems to linger as if loth to depart, though early autumn mounts the throne of the swiftly changing season. Gradually a transformation comes over the landscape. The foliage of the trees grows dark and sombre, the freshness is gone, and here and there the leaves are tinged with yellow and red and drop easily in response to the command of the breeze; the grass grows long and dark, and tall weeds and wild flowers peculiar to this month, spring up and bloom along the margin of the dusty highways, and in the mown fields. The pleasant autumnal breath of nature comes in through the open casement, and dries still more the parched gardens and the drooping shrubs; the chirp of the cricket sounds more sad and monotonous than ever, and one can almost fancy it saying perpetually, "Summer is gone!" But much of October is very beautiful, pleasure seekers and excursionists have not to "trust to the uncertain glory of an April day" but the sky if azure in the morning is seldom else at et of sun, and it is neither too warm nor too cold for enjoyment. It is true that nature is expiring, but so gradual and beautiful that it partakes more of a triumph, and the glorious colors that adorn the landscape crown her departing days with a splendor like that which accompanies the sun at its setting, and seems as an evidence of a pledge of future resurrection. Beautiful also is the scenery along the seashore. No change comes over that wide expanse (save in temperature) whose boundaries are the rock strand. Spring, summer, autumn and winter have little power over the mighty ocean. Onward, ever onward roll the restless billows and their voice is ever the same; true the surface of these briny waters reflect changing sky of different seasons; but little else than this is the ocean conscious of the great transformation the elements are effecting on mother earth. Solemnly and ceaselessly in the still air of autumn its mysterious murmurs fall upon the ear, waking thoughts of the past, the future and the sublimities of eternity.

Captured Prizes.

Dr. R. G. Howell, our local poultry fancier, succeeded in capturing prizes on all his birds at the Caledonia Fair.

LODGE NIGHT

"Going out this evening, dear?" asked Mrs. Kerlesse of her husband, when she saw him getting into his rain coat in the front hall after dinner.
"Yep"
"Where are you going to-night, love?"
"Lodge."
"Don't you go to your lodge oftener than you used to, hubby?"
"Nope. Why?"
"Oh, nothing, only I get so lonely night after night sitting here all alone I don't mind it so much while the children are awake and around the house, but they have to go to bed at 8 every night now that they've started to school, and after they get to sleep the house becomes so quiet the ticking of the clock frightens me with its noise. I was thinning, as I sat alone here last night, how different it was in the dear dead days of our courtship, when you were my lover instead of my husband. Remember how unhappy you were if you could not be with me every evening. I don't blame you for having changed. No man runs after a street car after he has caught it. Still, honey, I would like to go out with you once in a while in the evening."—Buffalo Express
