he had heard it many times from his seat in the press row, the voice of the judge solemnly intone, "And may God have merey on your soul." Never that—never that—for Barbara! You can't mean—" he stammered.

He fought his way back to self-control, his nails forcing tiny red drops of blood from the palms of his elenched hands. If Barbara was guilty, he would share her guilt. He was accessory after the wind. He was accessory after the fact of murder.

This time there was no hesitation on the doorstep before he rang the bell. Peter's training stood him in good stead; the black and white authous wood stead; the black and white authous who answered the door saw only a tall and rather pale young man whose clothes were badly in meed of brashing—several twigs and bits of leaf were clinging to them—but who showed no evidence of excitement. Peter stood anxiously waiting in the small room, where daffodils had replaced the marigolds, but where a little fire still twinkled in the grate. He wished he had warned her to take off that dust-streaked dress before she came down. She might meet any number of servants, and they'd be sure to notice it and wonder. He wished he had told her to destroy his sard—but then, the girl might already have read it on her way up. He had thought only of Barbara while he was steady. "I can't marry you Peter—

"Why not?" Peter glared down at her belligerently.

"Because—" Barbara took a deep breath, then went on steadily. "I'm going to tell you something I have never hinted to another soul. I told you how Dr. Cavanaugh adopted me out of the orphanage. I rather think that I am really his daughter."

It was so far from what Peter had wishing that he had committed any number of crimes so that he would have been practiced in technique, would know exactly what ought to be done. Suppose he made some horrible had caught be suppose he could not save be. Suppose—

It was so far from what Peter had expected her to say that he could only stare at her in blank amazement.

"But, darling child," he said when he had caught his breath, "can you think for one moment that that would make any difference to me?"

INTRODUCTION—This letter was probably written by the apostle Johr about A.D. 99. Its main object was to safeguard its readers against certain false teachers. It tells of the revelation of God which came in Jesus of Nazareth, and what it meant for those who follow him.

Saying "No"

In numberless cases the failure to utter a ringing "No" that ought to be spoken is due to fear of the cost. The very fact of the cost is what wins for the man brave enough to speak the sincere respect of those that may heartily disagree with his judgment.

What are the mark of a Christian? Among many others, one answer has usually been prominent—and frequently the first in importance, orthodoxy. Not so does the New Testament teach us. Love is the true orthodoxy. It is the central and determining quality in the character of God. Only the man with love in his heart is a child of God.

II. THE PROOF OF FATHERHOOD, John 4: 9-11.

that may heartily disagree with his judgment.

Often the fear may be less about personal consequences than about seeming discourtesy. It is to be remembered that there may be both graciousness and positiveness without any sacrifice of either. As in Chinese the same syllable may have wholly different meanings according to the inflection given, there are more ways than one of uttering "No."

A man that won prominence owed much to the training of a wise mother, who noted his weakness when a boy. She used to put to him a series of questions each call-looks to the future with glad expecta-tion. Perfect love has east out fear by swallowing up the cause of it.
