CHAPTER XGV .- (Cont'd.) "As a matter of fact," Chris continued, "Gordy thinks much the best thing would be to let the whole thing drop, not persecute. In that case I decline to appear against him, say that nothing was stolen—nothing was and the man would be discharged."

"Wouldn't the police—wouldn't the District. Attorney prosecute."

"Wouldn't the police—wouldn't the District Attorney prosecute?"

"I don't believe so."

"He might—" she said, in agony.

"Not without a complaint being filed."

"I think Gordy's brother considerable pull," the man went on; he'll work it, if we need it. But at any rate, here's what I was thinking," he added, in a brisker tone, returning to the problem of the present moment. "They're through with us, and we can beat it. I'll have Rountree take the luncheon on. He can have the crowd over to the Club. You're in no condition to play hostess after ast night, and Gordon'll make our excuses. Get your things, and put them in the car and we'll drive out somewhere and fool away the time until your Los Angeles train is due."
