"Anyway, I'm sure that she wasn't worried or apprehensive or particularly excited about anything. Sheila isn't the worrying type, and as for apprehension—if she thought there was anything for her to be afraid of, she'd clap her hands together in that way she has and go after it as an added thrill. But there was absolutely no sign of anything in the wind. I remarked when we had had our coffee that I was going around to the club—though as a matter of fact I didn't go after all. I just took a long drive all though as a matter of fact I didn't go after all. I just took a long drive all by myself into the country, thinking about—things. When I left the house she was on her way upstairs; she said she was going to bed early and get a good night's sleep.

"That is the last I've seen of her. She left all the lights burning in her boudoir—they were still burning next morning. She didn't take anything with her, not even a suit-case. In the morning she just—wasn't there. You know Sheila?"

The doctor had listened without interrupting Don's recital by so much

It creates un necessary difficulties. What you do. you do. Either don't do it, or stand by it. You always go on from where you are, you know—not back."

"I did stand by it, didn't I? God knows—" The young man's voice was harsh with emotion. "Mrs. Ellsworth left, and you want me to find her?" the older man prompted imperturbably.

"I want anything rather than all this blare—the very thing I'd give my eye teeth to avoid."

"You did not report that your wife was missing, then?"

"I certainly didn't. If you knew
