Viewing China
From Within

By R. V. C. Bodley, in The Sphere.

The tourist, while perhaps covering more actual mileage than the actual resident, only sees China superdially, and returns home with recollections of modern Shanghal with its skyscrapers and lingerie shops or of cosmopolitan Tientsin. Even those who have transled as far as Peking have act lifted the veil over the private life of the Chinaman, or realized that the people whom they probably scarnfully gelet to as "natiges," consider themselves infinitely superfor, to any foreigner, whose customs, and especially meanners, fill them with contempt.

Through the courtesy of a British firm in Tieffsin, I was able to make a journey into the northern parts, of Shihli, and up to that part of the great wall of China which is not kept-up for the benefit of tourists. Accompanied by a member of the firm, I covered nearly five hundred miles, partly in a Ford car and partly on foot, meeting Ford car and partly on foot, meeting Ford car and partly on foot, meeting for the firm in Tienthin in the firm in the firm in the firm, I covered hearly five hundred miles, partly in a Ford car and partly on foot, meeting for the firm, I covered nearly five hundred miles, partly in a Ford car and partly on foot, meeting for the firm in French, occasionally in German Ford car and partly on foot, meeting for the firm in French, occasionally in German French occasionally in German French occasionally in German French occasionally in German French, occasionally in German French occasionally in German French

The only ones whom I could have accused ill-manners were the soldiery, who stopped the car at every possible opportunity, asked a number of needless questions, and finally issued passes ostensibly to permit the car to trave over their wretched tracks, but reality to furnish the troops with a little extra pocket-money, though why A soldier should need money in a count try where the people give them everything for fear of reprisals is difficult.

Chinamen rarely entertain in their own homes. They usually invite their guests to a restaurant, which in China is divided off into cubicles to accommodate any size of party. In addition to the usual flaked jelly fich, omelettes, ancient black eggs, pork fat and rice, we had specialties such as prawns cooked in butter, fried bread, baked lobsters, bamboo shoots flavoured with shrimps' eggs, and various kinds of pickled sea-weeds. They also provided a jar of excellent millet wine, which we drank very hot in little cups. The meal was terminated by the traditional bowls of rice and any remains of diuner which took the fancy, the main rule being to finish the rice to the dregs with as much snorting and gurgling as possible, and calling for a damp towel to wipe the face and hands. to leave the table with our hosts without further delay, it being

The young brush-turkey of the Australian region scrambles out of its tunnel immediate iy upon hatching, and does not bestow so much as a look upon the mound of rubbish and decaying leaves that formed its nest, yet when the time for mating comes, it will build a mound just as its ancestors have done. Moreover, young birds rearged by hand in artificial nests will later build the proper kind of nest-for their species. A finch will have the impulse to weave coarse material into a rough cup, and then to line this with a finer material; the tailorbird takes leaves and sews them together; and the house-martin collects mud or clay and constructs a cup against the side of a cliff or a house.
