Pine-Fed Pigs

In the Middle Ages millions porkers picked up a precarious liv-ing in the great forests, grubbing for acorns and roots. To-day they are regaled on quick-fattening oilcake, which makes better bacon. But such fare is dear, and Germans have been enjoined to observe economy in pig-feeding. Now a German chemist as come to their aid with an extract om pine-wood, of which commodity Germany has millions of acres. It is claimed that this extract is capable of fattening pigs rapidly and satisfactorily. The experimental results have proved so encouraging that a factory has been set up at Mannheim to produce the extract.

Henrietta began life in the humble way on a farm in the neighborhood of Dublin. But a bird of her ability was bound to get on, and now she is a favored immate at the Gasnevin Agricultural College, Dublin. Henrietta looks like a Rhode Island Red, but, as they say at the College, you can't tell a book by its cover. However, shortly they will know more, for then some of the mysterious eggs are going to hatch. Cynics remarks that in Chile there is a breed of hen which lays blue eggs as a matter of course without getting any of the limelight attaching to Henrietta. But Henrietta merely answers "Cut! Cut!"
