ting oneself above the other. Jonathan knew that David was a rival for his throne. But Jonathan's friendship never wavered. He was big enough to see that David was even bigger than he. Therefore he took a lower place and let the better man rule.

It takes a big person to be a true friend. Can you really rejoice when you see an honor come to your friend? Can you truly acknowledge that in some particulars your friend is your superior? Are you willing to take advice from your friend? Even to take a lesser seat than the throne if your friend is better fitted to occupy the throne.

Or when the friend announces that he has been honored, do you at once think of a greater honor that came to you stand back to allow your friend the first choice? Or do you frantically hasten forward to get the chief place?

There is a test for choosing friends and it is well to know it. If a person does not help us to be braver, cleanded and it is well to know it.
