SPEAKING OF HEROES

one of our bigfinanciers has a definition of a hero a little different from that of most of us. He does into describe a soldier, or an explorer, or any of the figures that appeal to the popular imagination. This is his idea of a hero, the plain, old-fashioned man who spends less than he produces. For he points out that the restoration of the world after the devastation of the war, will after the desired at the home of Mrs. Violation of the termination after the devastation of the war, will be possible only if there are big sums of money waiting to be invested. He reminds us that if a hundred million people save twenty cents a day, in a year of three hundred working days the savings would amount to six billion dollars.

There came the reaction: "Such differences have incurred the hostility of those who have assumed to be among the leaders of the party in this first idea is to buy himself a car. There is little likelihood of his qualatifying as a hero, according to the definition given above. Instead of spending less than he earns, he bids fair to become one of those pathetic figures, the man who is always bearing money in these days does. Saving money in these days does call for heroism, because it calls for self-denial, because it means saying model.
