A New Deal For the Workers

Good Sense

Elliott Roosevelt has shown himself to be a young man of good sense and considerable delicacy of feeling—to say nothing of proper self-respect—by cutting loose from Washington and New York and heading for the far west to establish himself on a cattle ranch. The President's son had been an advertising man in New York. But he found it almost impossible to solicit business which did not have some connection with Washington. He was offered a host of new jobs, but in almost every case his would-be employer quietly assumed that he would serve as a close-to-the-throne lobbyist at the American Capital. So he decided to go west, to the ranges, where the fact go west, to the ranges, where the fact wages, they have shared their work wages. American Capital. So he decided to go west, to the ranges, where the fact that his father is President will make no difference to anyone. — Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph. Chronicle-Telegraph.
